

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. LAWYERS' REPORTS

ANNOTATED.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

PENN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

MECHANICS' SAVINGS BANK & TRUST

(37 U. S. App. 602; 43 U. S. App. 73.)

1. Under a statute providing that in case of warranty of answers in an application for insurance no misrepresentation made in good faith shall defeat the policy unless it is material to the risk, the mere fact of warranty in form will not render every statement of fact material, but the question of materiality is subject to judicial investigation.

2. False answers in an application for insurance, knowingly made for the purpose of misleading the company, although not material, will avoid the policy under a statute providing that such answers innocently made shall have no effect on the policy.

3. Certificates in mutual aid societies do not constitute insurance within the meaning of a question in an application blank of an insurance company as to "existing insurance" in this or any other company.

4. Omitting a part of the insurance carried, from an answer to a question in an application as to policies in other companies, with directions to state companies and amount, will render the answer false.

NOTE.—Is a benefit association an insurance company?

- I. Where the question is as to "other insurance."
- II. Where the construction of the certificate is in question.
- III. Where compliance with state insurance law is required before doing business.
- IV. Where the question is in regard to jurisdiction.
- V. Under statutes exempting benevolent societies.
- VI. Where the question is not discussed.
- VII. Some definitions.
- VIII. Summary.

In controversies arising with a mutual benefit association, the weight of authority seems clearly to establish the rule that such companies are insurance companies, and their contracts are governed by the same rules as insurance policies limited by the constitution and by-laws of the association, or by statutes specifically exempting such associations. But there are some cases where the association is held to be purely benevolent and not insurance. Such associations are usually controlled by insurance laws in regard to transacting business in the state unless specifically exempted by statute, and are then if they exceed their powers. They are usually regarded as insurance companies on the question of jurisdiction. Under statutes exempting benevolent associations from the operation of general insurance laws, such societies are frequently regarded as insurance companies for all purposes except those limited by the proviso in the exempting statute.

I. Where the question is as to "other insurance."

In the case of PENN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE CO. v. MECHANICS' SAVINGS BANK & TRUST CO. it was held that certificates in mutual aid societies do not constitute insurance within the meaning of a question in an application blank of an insurance company as to "existing insurance" in this or any other company.

This is in accord with the decisions in similar cases where the question has been fairly presented. In some other similar cases the question turned on estoppel, and the question as to whether mutual benefit associations were insurance companies was not discussed.

In an action upon a policy where the defense was breach of warranty in answering the question, Has any company or association declined to grant a policy on your life? when in fact the assured had made application in the People's Mutual Benefit Association of Waterville, it was held that this was no defense. The court said: "I find that the legislature has itself made a distinction, and has used the term 'policy,' or 'certificate of membership,' apparently in contradistinction one to the other, the word 'policy' as referring to a contract of insurance, issued by life insurance companies other than those organized under § 3830, and in that section which authorizes the organization of such companies it provides for the issuing of certificates of membership, and that 'no company or organization shall issue a certificate for a greater amount than such company or organization shall be able to pay from the proceeds of one assessment.' I find further in every case of a mutual benefit association that the contract of insurance is termed a certificate of membership." White v. National L. Ins. Co. 30 Ohio L. J. 237.

And in an action on a policy issued by the Equitable Life Insurance Company, the plaintiff was properly permitted to prove by the agent of the defendant company, by whom the application was secured, that pending negotiations between him and the insured, and before the insured made answer to the question as to other insurance, the insured asked the agent what was meant by that; if it referred to assessment companies or mutual companies? Witness explained that it did not, and the insured then said he had made application to the "Legion of Honor" for assurance, whereupon witness told him that the "Legion of Honor" was a mutual company and was not regarded as a life insurance company, and he was instructed by the general agent of the defendant not to consider them as assurance companies. Equitable L. Ins. Co. v. Hazlewood, 75 Tex. 338, 7 L. R. A. 217.

So where defense was made to an action on a policy on the ground that the applicant had given

- 5. Upon the question of intent in omitting existing policies from the answer to a question in an application as to amount of other insurance, evidence of similar omissions by the applicant in answer to similar questions by other companies is relevant and competent.
- 6. An insurance expert cannot be permitted to give his opinion that certain undisclosed facts increased the risk of a life policy, but he may state the usage of insurance companies as to rejecting risks when made aware of such facts.
- 7. An insurance expert will not be permitted to state whether or not a misrepresented or concealed fact in an application for a life policy would be regarded among insurance companies generally as material.

8. The question as to the materiality of the omission to mention another policy in an application for life insurance, and of the fact that the applicant was an embezzler, is for the jury under a statute providing that misstatements and concealments shall not defeat the policy unless material.

9. Mere temporary ailments or affections not of a serious or dangerous character, which pass away and are likely to be forgotten because they leave no trace in the constitution, are not to be regarded as diseases within the meaning of a life insurance policy.

10. A question as to occupation in an application for life insurance does not call for information as to the fact of the applicant being an habitual embezzler.

a false answer to the question of other insurance, the company was held liable on the ground of estoppel by the act of the agent in explaining to the applicant that other insurance did not include "co-operative" companies, under Iowa Laws 1880, chap. 211, p. 200, providing that the person soliciting insurance shall be held to be the soliciting agent of the company. It was further held "the purport of the word 'insurance' in the question, 'Has the said party any other insurance on his life?' is not so absolutely certain as, in an action upon the policy, to preclude proof as to what kind of life insurance the contracting parties had in mind when that question was answered. Such proof does not necessarily contradict the written contract. Consequently, the above clause, printed on the back of the policy, is to be interpreted in the light of the statute and of the understanding reached between the assured and the company by its agent when the application was completed, namely, that the particular kind of insurance inquired about did not include insurance in co-operative societies. In view of the statute and of that understanding, upon the faith of which the assured made his application, paid the first premium, and accepted the policy, the company is estopped, by every principle of justice, from saying that its question embraced insurance in co-operative associations." Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Chamberlain, 132 U. S. 804, 38 L. ed. 841.

But where the insured answered "No" to the question, Are you now insured in any other company? and he held at that time certificates of membership of insurance in the Buffalo Life & Reserve Association, and in the Rochester Mutual Aid & Accident Association, and it was contended that such other life insurance was not in the regular and authorized insurance companies, but was in aid and accident associations, and that insurance in such last-named companies was not a breach of the warranty, it was held that such companies were unquestionably life insurance companies, under N. Y. Laws 1883, chap. 176, § 5, providing, in substance, any corporation or association issuing certificates or agreements whereby upon the decease of a member any money is to be paid to the representatives or beneficiary designated, to be derived from donations or admission fee, dues and assessments collected from the members, and wherein the payment is conditioned upon the same being realized in the manner aforesaid, and wherein the money is applied to the uses and purpose of such corporation, association, or society, and expenses, shall be deemed to be engaged in the business of life insurance upon the co-operative or assessment plan. McCollum v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 55 Hun, 103.

And where the insured answered "No," to the question in the application, Has any other insurance company declined to grant a policy on your life? when in fact he had made an application to the National Benefit Association which had been rejected, it was held that such false statement vitiated his policy, although the court did not discuss the question whether such other application was to a life insurance company, but assumed that it was. Kemp v. Good Templars' Mut. Ben. Assn. 46 N. Y. S. R. 429.

In Clapp v. Massachusetts Ben. Assn. 146 Mass. 519, which was an action on a certificate of membership, and the defense was a breach of warranty in answering "No" to the question, Has any proposal or application to insure your life ever been made to any company or agent upon which a policy has not been issued? and there was evidence that an application had been made to the New England Mutual Aid Society, the court did not discuss the question as to whether or not it was an insurance company, but whether the jury should have been instructed as for a non-suit.

II. Where the construction of the certificate is in question.

The weight of authority on matters of the construction of the certificate as to beneficiaries, forfeiture, and the like, treats mutual benefit societies as life insurance companies in the absence of statutes defining them not to be insurance companies, although some of the cases hold that the by-laws and constitution became a part of the contract, and thus cause the certificates in some respects to differ from ordinary insurance policies. Lake v. Minnesota Masonic Relief Assn. 61 Minn. 96; Block v. Valley Mut. Ins. Assn. 53 Ark. 301; National Mut. Aid Soc. v. Lupold, 101 Pa. 111; Tennessee Lodge No. 20, K. of H. v. Ladd, 5 Lea, 716; Olmstead v. Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc. 37 Kan. 98; Chartrand v. Brace, 16 Colo. 19, 12 L. R. A. 200; Goodman v. Jeddijah Lodge No. 7, I. O. of B. B. 67 Md. 117; Walter v. Hensel, 42 Minn. 204; Massey v. Mutual Relief Soc. 102 N. Y. 523; Barton v. Provident Mut. Relief Assn. 63 N. H. 535; Splawn v. Chew, 80 Tex. 532; Bauer v. Knights Templars & M. Life Indemnity Co. 36 Fed. Rep. 439; National Union v. Marlow, 40 U. S. App. 95, 74 Fed. Rep. 775; Supreme Commandery, K. of G. R. v. Ainsworth, 71 Ala. 438, 46 Am. Rep. 332; Smith v. Bullard, 61 N. H. 381; Stambler v. Order of Penta, 159 Pa. 462; Erdmann v. Mutual Ins. Co. O. of H. S. 44 Wis. 376; *Danlher v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. So where the question was as to the amount due the beneficiary it was held that the Minnesota Masonic Relief Association was a mutual life insurance company proceeding on the assessment plan, and its contracts were to be construed according to

11. A warranty in an application for life insurance, that no circumstance or information has been withheld touching applicant's past or present state of health and habits of life with which the insurer ought to be acquainted, does not cover a habit of embezzlement as to which the application contains no inquiry.

12. Concealment by an applicant for life insurance, of embezzlements by him which are not inquired about by the insurer, will not, unless fraudulent, avoid the policy, although the fact of embezzlement may be material to the risk.

13. The burden is on the insurer to show materiality of a concealment by an applicant for life insurance, as well as fraudulent intent, for the purpose of avoiding the policy.

14. Materiality of a concealment of other insurance upon a life risk cannot be presumed from the fact that such concealment was made by the applicant in applications to other companies.

15. An insurer is not entitled to an instruction to the jury that the failure of an applicant for insurance to mention a policy in another company when asked about other insurance raises the presumption that the omission was fraudulent.

On rehearing.

16. A representation is made in bad faith, within the meaning of a statute providing that it shall not avoid the policy unless made in bad faith, only when it is made with actual intent to mislead, not when it is made through forgetfulness and inadvertence.

the same rules as those of any other mutual life insurance company. This was organized to provide for the payment to the widow, children, or mother (or such person as designated), of any member of such society as may from time to time decease, of such sum as the by-laws of such association may from time to time prescribe; the said sum to be raised by voluntary contribution by the members, each surviving member to be assessed at the death of a member at certain rates. Lake v. Minnesota Masonic Relief Assn., 61 Minn. 96.

In Block v. Valley Mut. Ins. Assn., 53 Ark. 201, where the question was as to the assignability of the insurance, and it was claimed to be issued by a mutual benefit company, and the charter and articles of association were not shown, and the by-laws showed that the object was mutually to associate a number of individuals whereby the survivors were to contribute for the relief of the representatives of those of their number whom death may strike down, it was held to be an ordinary insurance policy.

And under Pa. act March 14, 1873, Pamph. Laws, 46, authorizing assignees of life, fire, and marine insurance policies to sue in their own name, it was held that a mutual aid association was an insurance company within the operation of that act, but the charter controlled as to assignments where it was an express condition of the contract that the certificates should not be otherwise assigned or transferred, as this takes them from the operation of the act. It was said that "the contention that the association is not an insurance company within the meaning of the act of 1873 cannot be maintained. All that was decided in Com. v. National Mut. Aid Assn., 94 Pa. 481, was that the corporation was excepted from the operation of the act taxing foreign insurance companies." National Mut. Aid Soc. v. Lupold, 101 Pa. 111.

So, where the question was as to the right to change a beneficiary, it was held that a benefit certificate in the Supreme Lodge Knights of Honor of the World would be governed by the same rule as a policy of insurance. Tennessee Lodge, No. 20, K. of H. v. Ladd, 5 Lea, 716.

In Olmstead v. Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc., 87 Kan. 93, which company was organized under the laws of Kansas "to give financial aid and benefit to the widows, orphans, and dependents of deceased members thereof," it was held that Kan. Laws 1871, chap. 93, § 76, providing that in case any life insurance company organized under the laws of this state shall have issued a policy and the beneficiary dies, the party insured may require a new policy to be issued in favor of another beneficiary, applied to this society.

In Titworth v. Titworth, 40 Kan. 571, the case of Olmstead v. Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc., 87 Kan. 93, was distinguished, as in that case the company was organized under the Kansas law and in this case of Ancient Order of United Workmen was not incorporated but was a voluntary association governed by its own constitution and by-laws, and in the former case the record did not show that the rules of the society provided for a change of the beneficiary, and in the Olmstead Case no change was made by the society. It was said that the attention of the court was not called to Kan. Comp. Laws 1885, chap. 50a, § 78, exempting companies organized on the co-operative plan.

A society known as the "Ancient Order of United Workmen" so far as it engaged in the business of life insurance was held to be a mutual life insurance company. In this case the certificate stated that it was issued by the authority of the Supreme Lodge of the Ancient Order of United Workmen witnessing that it, as master workman degree member was entitled to the privileges of membership and to participate in the beneficiary fund of the order to the amount of $2,000 which at his death shall be paid to his wife, etc., providing that K. shall in every particular while a member of said order comply with all the laws, rules, and requirements thereof. The question in this case was as to the fund vesting in administrators. Chartrand v. Brace, 16 Colo. 19, 12 L. R. A. 209.

And the Jedidjah Lodge No. 7 of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith was a system of mutual or co-operative life insurance. The court said: "Under it a book of endowment certificates was furnished to each subordinate lodge, and one of these certificates was issued to each member; and it stipulated for the payment of $1,000 upon his death to his widow and children, if he left any, and if not, then to a beneficiary to be designated by him, whose name must appear in the body of the instrument. Such certificates differ in no substantial point from ordinary life insurance policies issued by ordinary life insurance companies." Goodman v. Jedidjah Lodge No. 7, I. O. of B. B., 67 Md. 117.

And in Walter v. Hensel, 42 Minn. 204, it was held that the Minnesota Odd Fellows' Mutual Benefit Society, a corporation organized under Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 34, title 3, providing for the incorporation of a benefit society for the purpose of instruction or mutual improvement in art or science or for literary or social culture, and under articles of the association stating that the general nature and purpose was the insuring the lives of the members upon the plan of paying to the representatives of every deceased member a certain sum to be assessed upon and received from the other members of the said association, the court held that this was nothing more nor less than a mutual insurance company upon the assessment plan. The question involved was as to designation of beneficiaries.

And the Odd Fellows' Mutual Benefit Society organized under Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 34, title 3, relating to corporations other than those for pecuniary profit, and providing in its articles of association that the general nature of its business ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Tennessee to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Reversed.

Before Taft and Lurton, Circuit Judges, and Hammond, J.

Statement by Taft, Circuit Judge:

This action was on a policy of insurance for $10,000 issued December 2, 1892, by the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company to John Schardt, on his own life. Schardt died April 17, 1893, during the currency of the policy.

and purpose is the insuring the lives of the members upon the plan of paying to the representative of every deceased member a certain sum to be assessed upon and received from the other members of said association, was held to be a mutual life insurance company on the assessment plan, where the question involved was as to the designation of a beneficiary. Walter v. Hensel, 42 Minn. 204.

Where the question was as to designation of beneficiary, and the Mutual Relief Society was organized under New York Laws 1875, chap. 267, entitled, "An Act for the Incorporation of Societies or Clubs for Certain Lawful Purposes," providing for the incorporation of social, political, and mutual benefit and benevolent purposes, it was held that the subject of life insurance was not among the enumerated objects, unless it was embraced in the term "mutual benefit" or "benevolent." It was further held that the first direct reference to anything of the nature of life insurance was in the by-laws, art. 1, § 2, providing that the objects of the society shall be to secure mutual benefit and protection to its members, and to furnish aid to their families or assigns in case of a member's death, and § 8 stating that the plan of the society will be to issue certificates for a sum not to exceed $2,000, to be paid to the heirs or beneficiaries of deceased members named in his certificate, from funds arising from assessments; and the court said the by-laws then proceed to organize a system similar to that of a mutual life insurance company. Massey v. Mutual Relief Soc. 102 N. Y. 523.

And where the question was as to the right to change the beneficiary in the Provident Mutual Relief Association, it was held that "the contract, though one of life insurance, must be interpreted according to its terms, in view of the laws of the defendant association and of the evident understanding of the parties." Barton v. Provident Mut. Relief Assn. 68 N. H. 535.

So, where the benefit fund in the American Legion of Honor was raised by means of payments by parties joining the order before being received into membership, and the assessments levied upon them upon death of a member, it was held to be, so far as those provisions are concerned, a mutual life insurance company in which the life of every member is insured, by reason of his membership and compliance with the requirements of the constitution and by-laws; but the rules of law for the construction of ordinary policies so far as they refer to the indefeasible rights of beneficiaries did not apply, where the by-laws of this association were different. Splawn v. Chew, 60 Tex. 532.

In Bauer v. Samson Lodge, K. of P. 102 Ind. 262, it was said that "a corporation which promises to pay a certain sum as benefits during a member's illness, in consideration of his payment of dues, is not a purely benevolent organization; it may be, and doubtless is, benevolent and charitable in a great 88 L. R. A.

Just before his death he had assigned the policy to the Mechanics' Savings Bank & Trust Company, of Nashville, Tennessee, to secure a large debt owed by him to the bank. Since his death the bank has made a general assignment for the benefit of creditors to J. J. Pryor, for whose benefit, as assignee, this suit was brought. The trial resulted in a judgment for the full amount of the policy and interest, in favor of the plaintiff below, and the insurance company brings the judgment here for review on writ of error. The defendant filed nineteen pleas to the declaration, averring that both by misrepresentation of facts warranted to be true in the application and policy, and by concealment of a fact material to the risk, the policy was avoided.

degree, but it is not a benevolent organization in the sense of dispensing benefits without consideration. The consideration the order receives is the dues paid by the member, and in return it promises him benefits. In speaking of an order of a character similar to the Knights of Pythias, the supreme court of Massachusetts said: "The corporation is not a mere charitable society, but is rather in the nature of an association for the mutual insurance of its members against sickness or accident." But it was held that the remedy under the by-laws must be first exhausted before an action could be maintained.

And a certificate issued by the Order of Chosen Friends was a contract of insurance, where the by-laws provided, should a member become permanently disabled by reason of disease or accident such member should be entitled to a benefit not exceeding one half of the relief-fund certificate held by him, and the refusal by the officers to allow his claim under a by-law making their decision final would not defeat a recovery. But the insured was required to exhaust his remedies under the by-laws before he could maintain the action. Supreme Council O. of C. F. v. Forsinger, 125 Ind. 52, 9 L. R. A. 501.

In the case of Northwestern Benev. & Mut. Aid Assn. v. Wanner, 24 Ill. App. 387, where it was claimed that a by-law passed after a certificate of insurance vitiated the certificate on account of suicide, it was held that "we cannot distinguish the appellant from any other mutual insurance company. In all mutual insurance the shareholder participates in the benefits and profits, and is a recognized member of the company." In this case it was contended that the insured took upon himself that he should comply with the constitution and by-laws, and that they might be changed limiting the liability.

Where it was claimed that the Knights Templar & Masons' Life Indemnity Company was not a life insurance company, and not subject to Mo. Rev. Stat. § 5982, preventing insurance companies from making a defense for suicide, and the officers and agents of this company enjoyed remunerative salaries, the commissions of the manager amounting to as much as $1,000 a month, and the company had no affiliation with the Masonic Order, and the Masonic feature was only limited to its name and restriction of its membership and employment of agents, it was held: "It is apparent, from an examination of its charter, and its method of doing business, that the defendant is a mutual life insurance company on the assessment plan. Its business is insurance, and nothing else. There is not a social, charitable, or benevolent feature in its organization, or the conduct of its business. It has no lodges, pays no sick dues, and distributes no aid, and gives no attention, to members in distress or poverty. It deals with its members on the strictest

The opening words of the policy were:

"In consideration of the application for this policy, which is hereby made a part of this contract (a copy of which is hereto attached), and of the payment by John Schardt of the premiums as hereinafter provided, the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company hereby promises to pay at its home office, in the city of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania," etc.

The questions and answers in the application which are material to the controversy here were as follows:

"1. A. Give your name in full and postoffice address? A. John Schardt, Nashville, Tennessee."

"Present and previous occupations? (State kind of business.) B. Present teller in Mechanics' Bank. Previous, same."

"6. A. Have you your life insured in this or any other company? (If so, give the name of each company, and the kind and amount of each policy.) A. Yes; $10,000 in Northwestern, 20 pay life; $5,000 in Aetna; $1,000 in N. Y. Mutual Life, renewable term."

After these answers this statement was signed by the applicant:

"I hereby warrant and agree, that I am temperate in my habits, now in good health, and ordinarily enjoy good health, and that in the statements and answers in this application no circumstance or information has been withheld touching my past and present state of business principles. The policy holders get nothing for which full value has not been paid by the assured, but the assured may pay much, and the policy holder receive nothing, by reason of the forfeiture of the policy, for a violation of some one of its numerous conditions. It would be a curious sort of benevolence which would withhold from innocent children the insurance effected for their benefit on the life of their father because he committed suicide. But that is the kind of benevolence the defendant wants to practice in this case. The assumption of a Masonic name does not make it a Masonic institution. Berry v. Knights Templar & M. Life Indemnity Co. 46 Fed. Rep. 439. Affirmed Knights Templar & M. Life Indemnity Co. v. Berry, 4 U. S. App. 353, 50 Fed. Rep. 511.

And where it was claimed that the association was exempt from Mo. Rev. Stat. 1899, § 5835, it was held that the senate of the National Union was not a fraternal beneficial society within the intent of the Missouri statute, where the association was exclusively engaged in collecting and distributing assessments, and where its members were not restricted to any class, calling, or profession; nor was it essential to membership that they should become interested or united in some good work or reform conducive to their own welfare or to the welfare of mankind in general, and the tests of membership required in this association were those usually prescribed by every well-regulated insurance company. National Union v. Marlow, 40 U. S. App. 95, 74 Fed. Rep. 775.

And a by-law in regard to suicide was construed to be controlled by the same law as governed other insurance, where it was held that "the instrument in writing upon which this suit is founded, and which is set out in full in the complaint, entitled a 'Knight's Benefit Certificate,' has the elements and characteristics of a contract of life insurance. It purports to have been issued by the 'Supreme Commandery of the Knights of the Golden Rule,' which is averred to be a corporation created and organized under a law of the state of Kentucky. The commandery hereby promises, on the death of the husband of the appellee, to pay her $2,000, in consideration of the husband having become a member of the order, and having paid the fee for admission to membership, and of his payment in the future of all assessments levied and required by the supreme commandery, upon the condition that he remained a member of the order, in good standing, and complied with all the laws then of force, or subsequently enacted. These are the essential elements of a contract of life insurance, made by a mutual insurance company with one of its members. . . . The payment of the fee for admission to membership, and of the assessments levied and required by the commandery, are the equivalent of premiums, and form the pecuniary consideration of the contract." Supreme Commandery, K. of G. R. v. Ainsworth, 71 Ala. 436, 46 Am. Rep. 382.

the Connecticut River Valley, a Massachusetts corporation established for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the sickness and burial of its deceased members or their heirs, the sum to be paid on admission measurably proportioned to the age of the applicant and an assessment on the death of a member, and an assessment upon the surviving members upon the death of a member, was an insurance contract under N. H. Gen. Laws, chap. 175, §§ 2, 3, providing that the amount of insurance is not chargeable with the debts of the deceased. The court said: "The corporation is a mutual life insurance company; membership is an insurance contract; and a certificate of membership, expressly or by necessary implication including the terms of the contract stated in the application, by-laws, and 'last legal assignment,' or last valid designation of the payee, is a policy." Smith v. Bullard, 61 N. H. 381.

And on the question of estoppel as applicable to a beneficial association by waiver of proof of loss, it was held "while such associations are in some respects unlike insurance companies, there is every reason for holding them to the rule applicable to notice and proofs of loss under ordinary insurance policies." Stambler v. Order of Pente, 159 Pa. 492.

So, where the question was one of forfeiture of certificate, it was held that a mutual insurance company of the Order of Hermann's Sons of Wisconsin on the assessment plan was subject to the application of those legal principles applicable to other mutual life insurance companies. Erdmann v. Mutual Ins. Co., O. of H. 8, 44 Wis. 376.

And a certificate in the Ancient Order of United Workmen was an insurance contract, and the association was in effect a mutual life insurance company, and the rights of the parties on the question of forfeiture were determined by the law applicable to life insurance companies where a certificate in the nature of an insurance policy was issued to a member and was kept in force by the payment of assessment and dues. Daniher v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 10 Utah, 110.

So, the Texas Benevolent Association was governed by the rules of law that are applied to ordinary life insurance companies in regard to forfeiting policies, where such association was organized for the mutual protection of its members and acted through its regular officers under a charter and by-laws, and resorted to assessments on its living members to procure funds to discharge its obligations to its officers and such of its members as should die. McCorkle v. Texas Benev. Assn. 71 Tex. 149.

And in Schunck v. Gegenseitiger Wittwen und Waisen Fond, 44 Wis. 369, in an action on a certificate issued by the Grand Lodge of the United Ancient Order of Druids, where a forfeiture was construed by the constitution and by-laws, it was said: "The defendant was obviously organized to answer the ends, or serve the purpose, of a mutual life insurance company. Among the provisions of health and habits of life with which the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company ought to be made acquainted; . . . and that the statements and answers to the printed questions above, together with this declaration, as well as those to be made to the company's medical examiner, shall constitute the application, and be the basis of this contract, and the place of contract shall be the city of Philadelphia, state of Pennsylvania."

Then followed the medical examination of the insured, of which only the questions and answers given below have a bearing on the issues in this case:

"9. A. How long since were you attended by a physician or professionally consulted one?

the constitution and by-laws adopted for its management, is one which provides that, on the death of a member, in good standing, there shall be paid to his surviving widow, or heirs, the sum of $800, as life insurance."

And the Citizens' Mut. Relief Society of Portland was a mutual life insurance company where the requisite qualifications for membership were to be a male resident of the city of P. or a business man resident in A. B. C. D. E. having a regular place of business in P., between twenty-one and sixty years of age and chosen by a two-thirds vote of the members of the society present and the payment of fee, and the object was the payment of a sum on the death of a member as relief to any person designated by him in writing, or to his widow, children, or relatives in the order specified in the articles of association. It was held that a misrepresentation invalidated the contract of insurance notwithstanding the acceptance by the member into the association. Swett v. Citizens' Mut. Relief Soc. 73 Me. 541.

And the Massachusetts Benefit Association was held to be a company doing a life insurance business, and its policies not benefit certificates within the meaning of the Missouri statutes relating to fraternal beneficial societies, but assessment-plan policies, or were governed by the more general statutes relating to life insurance, where the association agreed to pay the beneficiary $5,000 after proof of death, and the member was to pay in forty days from the date of the contract, and annually, an assessment of $15 as an expense fund, and bi-monthly the assessment specified in the table of rates, and the policy holders had no vote in the election of directors, and there was no lodge system connected with the organization, except a few boards or councils in different cities in Massachusetts who seemed to have no duties other than to solicit risks. But it was held that Mo. Rev. Stat. 1899, § 5849, providing that no misrepresentation in obtaining a life insurance policy shall render it void unless, etc., did not apply to a policy issued under chap. 89, art. 3, defining contracts of insurance on the assessment plan, and providing that nothing herein shall subject any corporation doing business under this article to any other provisions or requirements of the general insurance laws of this state except as herein set forth. Hanford v. Massachusetts Ben. Assn. 122 Mo. 50.

And where the defense was fraudulent concealment of material facts in response to the question as to having had medical attendance previously, it was held that "the liability to pay is founded solely on the contract obligation, which must be enforced (if at all) by the general principles applicable to life insurance." Nunrich v. Supreme Lodge, K. & L. of H. 24 N. Y. S. R. 287.

In Grossman v. Supreme Lodge, K. & L. of H. 18 N. Y. S. R. 502, where the question was as to the by-laws controlling in regard to a breach of warranty

"B. For what disease? *B. A cold.

"C. Give the name and residence of such physician? C. Dr. T. E. Enloe, Nashville, Tennessee."

"11. A. Do you now use intoxicating liquors?
A. None whatever."

"C. Have you always been temperate in their use? (If not, explain the duration and extent of excess, and when last.) C. Yes.

"12. Have you ever used opium, morphia, chloral, or any narcotic, unless regularly prescribed by a physician? (If so, explain fully.)
A. No.

"B. Have you had asthma, consumption, spitting of blood, habitual cough and expectoration, palpitation, or any disease of the throat, heart, or lungs? B. None except—No.

in a benefit certificate, it was held that they controlled, and it was said: "It would indeed be extraordinary that a certificate in the nature of a policy of life insurance should be issued without any examination as to the condition of the insured."

In Franklin Beneficial Assn. v. Com. 10 Pa. 337, it was said that the Franklin Beneficial Association is "virtually a mutual health-insurance company, standing, as regards the present question, exactly as a life insurance company." The question involved was as to disability incurred from soldiering.

And in Presbyterian Mut. Assur. Fund v. Allen, 108 Ind. 593, where the question was as to a warranty in the application, it was said: "The certificate, although issued by a mutual benefit association, is, in legal contemplation, a policy of insurance, and is in most respects governed by the general rules of law which apply to insurance contracts. . . . The weight of authority, as will appear from an examination of the cases cited, is in favor of the general doctrine that beneficiaries may be changed in cases where the policies like the one before us are issued by such associations as the present, and that in this respect such policies are not governed by the general rule which governs ordinary insurance contracts. But granting that this is the general rule, still it cannot prevail if the charter of the association prohibits a change in the beneficiary first agreed upon and designated."

But there are some mutual benefit companies which are plainly not insurance companies. Some cases have made a distinction on account of their by-laws in construing the contract of certificate, and other cases were under statutes providing that such companies shall not be deemed insurance companies. Swift v. San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board, 67 Cal. 567; Richmond v. Johnson, 28 Minn. 447; Johnson v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 163 Pa. 127; Dickinson v. Ancient Order of U. Jones, 154 Pa. 99.

So, where the question was as to the instrument being an asset of a decedent's estate, under art. 23 of the constitution of San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board, providing that on the death of a member of the board the trust fund shall pay from the increase in their hands from investment of said moneys to such person or object as may have been designated in writing by such deceased member the sum of $10,000, and in case of no disposition then to "Have you ever had cancer or any tumor, chronic diarrhoea, discharge from the ear, dropsy, fistula, gall stones or gravel, open sores, inflammatory rheumatism, gout, syphilis, or stricture, or any disease of the liver, kidneys, or bladder? C. None except—No.

"14. Have you had any illness or disease other than as stated by you above? (If so, state full particulars.) No.

"Give here particulars as to date, duration, severity, etc., of each disease you have had.

"*Explain fully 9, A and B.

"None.

"It is hereby agreed: That all the foregoing statements and answers made to the company's medical examiner are warranted to be true and are offered to the company as a consideration of the contract."

It was conceded that at the date of the application Schardt had a policy for $5,000 in New York Life Insurance Company, which he failed to mention. In order to show an intent on his part to deceive by this omission, defendant offered to show that in applications for policies in other companies for $25,000 each, made by him, one in February, 1893, and the other early in March following, he had also untruly stated the amount of existing insurance on his life. This offer was rejected by the court. Schardt's salary as teller was $1,500, and he had but a small amount of property. When he died in April, 1893, he had $80,000 of insurance on his life, nearly all the wife, then to the child, and if none there shall be no payment, it was held that there was no contract of insurance between the members. It was also held that the contract merely provided for a beneficiary fund, and for the payment out of the fund of a specified sum to the surviving or designated person or persons qualified to receive it upon the death of a member, and the term "life insurance" did not apply to such an object. Swift v. San Francisco Stock & Exch. Board, 67 Cal. 567.

And in Richmond v. Johnson, 28 Minn. 447, it was said that the Grand Lodge Ancient Order of United Workmen was a mutual benefit association incorporated under the laws of that state, and that the certificate was not an ordinary contract of insurance made between an insurance company and another person, the rights of the parties to be determined exclusively by the policy; but the rights depended, not on the certificate only, but rather on the membership of the assured in the association, and such rights were defined and controlled by its constitution and by-laws.

A certificate of membership of a beneficial association was held not to be a contract of insurance within the meaning of Pa. act May 11, 1881, Pub. Laws, 20, requiring the application for insurance to be attached to the policy before it can be received in evidence. Dickinson v. Ancient Order of U. W. 150 Pa. 258; Johnson v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 163 Pa. 127; Lithgow v. Supreme Tent, K. of M. of the World, 165 Pa. 202.

In Lithgow v. Supreme Tent, K. of M. of the World, 165 Pa. 202, it was said that the case of Com. v. Equitable Beneficial Assn. 137 Pa. 412, arose under a different act of assembly, that of April 29, 1874; but the question was whether the defendant was an insurance company or a beneficial association, and the distinction so clearly pointed out in the opinion between these two classes of organizations has since been approved and followed under the act of May 11, 1881, in Dickinson v. Ancient Order of U. W. 150 Pa. 258.

In McAlees v. Supreme Sitting O. of I. H. (Pa.) 12 Cent. Rep. 415, where it was contended that the Supreme Sitting Order of Iron Hall was a mutual insurance company and controlled by Pa. act May 11, 1881, Pub. Laws, 20, relating to life and fire insurance policies, and providing that the constitution and by-laws should not be received in evidence unless attached to the policy, and that the remedy afforded by the by-laws was therefore not obligatory on the member of a beneficiary company because the by-laws were not made a part of the policy, it was held, without discussing the question of insurance, that a member of a beneficial society must resort to the society tribunals, and that a fair judgment thereon would be conclusive.

The Burlington Voluntary Relief Department of the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad Company, which maintained a fund for the relief of members and their relatives or beneficiaries, in case of sickness, accident, or death, was held not to be an insurance company on the ground that it did not purport to be an insurance company, and while the benefits were in the way of relief in case of sickness, accident, or death, the manifest intent was different, and this was not an insurance company but a beneficial association. The fund was to be obtained by monthly assessment of its members, and the amount deducted from monthly payments, and such amounts as were not raised from these assessments were to be made up by the company from its earnings in the way of interest on the monthly balances of the relief department, and the incidental expenses were paid by the railroad company, and in case the fund of the relief department was not sufficient the company paid all benefits due in full, and the relief department was organized in connection with the workings of the company in the way of benefiting its employees. Donald v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 93 Iowa, 284, 33 L. R. A. 462.

So, a benefit certificate issued by the Order of Railroad Conductors differed from an ordinary policy of life insurance, where such association was organized under the statute of Iowa, § 7, providing that no corporation or association under this act shall issue any certificate unless the beneficiary shall be the husband, wife, relative, legal representative, heir, or legatee of such insured member, and whose by-laws provided: "Its object is to aid and benefit disabled, and the families of deceased, members of the Order of Railway Conductors." It was said: "A benefit certificate of this kind has some of the features of an insurance policy, but it also has its point of difference, and, in the particular we are now considering, it is testamentary in its character. The rule of the law of insurance, that if one have an insurable interest at the date of the policy, the policy is not vitiated by termination of that interest, does not apply in a case like this." Order of Railway Conductors of America v. Koster, 55 Mo. App. 186.

And where the question was, Who was entitled to the insurance in the Royal Arcanum? it was held that for many, and indeed for most, purposes, mutual benefit associations are insurance companies, and the certificates issued by them are policies of life insurance, governed by the rules of law applicable to such policies. The court said that there are, however, some essential differences usually existing between the contracts evidenced by such certificates and the ordinary contract of life insurance, and that the most usual difference is the power on the part of the insured in mutual benefit associations to change the beneficiary. Holland v. Taylor, 111 Ind. 181.

And where the question was as to the right of the beneficiary being vested it was said: "That such is the rule when a contract of insurance is entered into between a life insurance company and a third of which had been written within six months. It was conceded that, for more than a year prior to his death, Schardt had been constantly embezzling the funds of his bank, and that his indebtedness to the bank thus criminally incurred amounted at the time of the application for this policy to little less than $100,000, and at his death exceeded that sum. He did not disclose the fact of his crime to the defendant at the time of his application, or at any other time. His death in April, 1893, was caused by congestion of the brain and other vital organs, caused by the mental strain which a disclosure of his crime brought on. Defendant introduced evidence tending to show that, six years before the application Schardt had had the syphilis, a venereal and constitutional disease; that thereafter he had sore throat, due to syphilis; and that in 1892 he had had the gonorrhea, a venereal disease. In rebuttal, plaintiff adduced evidence making it probable that Schardt did not have the syphilis, but only a local sore, difficult to distinguish from the first symptom of syphilis, called a "chancreoid," which was of no seriousness as a disease; that its resemblance to syphilis in the first stages induced a treatment for syphilis; that the result of such treatment was a cauterization of the throat, and a subsequent local inflammation of the throat; that Schardt then changed his physician, and employed Dr. Enloe, the one named in the application, who became the regular physician of himself and family during the next six years until his death, and during this period treated him for this throat trouble, and for indigestion at times. Evidence was party, whereby the company agrees to pay the amount due on the policy to such third party, is not questioned. In such cases the third party or beneficiary is a party to the contract of insurance. When, however, a person joins a mutual benefit association of the character of the Iowa Legion of Honor, his rights in the beneficiary fund, and his control over the same, are usually determined by the constitution of the order." Lamont v. Grand Lodge, I. L. of H. 81 Fed. Rep. 177.

In Titworth v. Titworth, 40 Kan. 571, it was held that Kan. Law 1871, chap. 93, § 76, did not apply to the Ancient Order of United Workmen, which was an association governed by its own constitution and by-laws; distinguishing Olmstead v. Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc. 37 Kan. 93, saying: "In the Olmstead Case no change was made by the society; in this case the association did make a change, at the request and on the application of the member; so that an entirely different class of questions arises in the two cases. Finally, § 78, chap. 50, a, Compiled Laws 1885, declares that the provisions of the act containing § 76 shall not apply to companies organized on the co-operative plan, and we think this Order of United Workmen operates on that plan. The defendant company in the Olmstead Case was also organized on the co-operative plan; but, as the section making the provisions of the act inapplicable to such companies was not then brought to the attention of the court, it was erroneously led to apply the rule prescribed in § 76, and to state it as an additional ground for the decision there made. The case was, however, correctly disposed of on the first ground of decision."

In Masonic Benev. Assn. v. Bunch, 109 Mo. 560, it was said: "Were the plaintiff in this case an ordinary life insurance company, and the right to the benefits to be determined by the rules governing life insurance, we would have little hesitation in saying that the averments . . . are insufficient to show an insurable interest in the life of Lewis Bunch. But will this rule apply to these benevolent associations? By the statute authorizing their creation they are declared not to be insurance companies. The courts have not agreed how far the principles governing life insurance generally should be applied." It was held the beneficiary's interest in an ordinary policy of life insurance was a vested right immediately upon the issuing of the policy, whereas in a benevolent society like plaintiff the beneficiary had no vested right in the certificate before the death of the member on whose account it was issued, and the member could change the beneficiary without the consent of the beneficiary.

In regard to changing the beneficiaries it was held that the rules governing policies issued by ordinary insurance companies were not controlling when applied to certificates of membership in an 88 L. R. A.

association such as that here involved under Ind. act March 2, 1879, relating to beneficiary societies, providing that the benefits shall be for the sole use and benefit of the parties named as beneficiaries in the policy or certificate of membership. Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc. v. Burkhart, 110 Ind. 189.

And where a beneficial association was established with a view to peculiarly aid the widows, orphans, heirs, and devisees of deceased members, and the fund was claimed by an executor as against the heirs, it was held: "The association is not an insurance company, nor are these certificates issued by it in the state of Illinois, contracts of insurance." By the statute of Illinois under which the association was incorporated it was provided that associations to benefit widows, orphans, heirs, and devisees of deceased members thereof, and where no annual dues or premiums are required, and where the member shall receive no money as profit or otherwise, shall not be deemed insurance companies. Northwestern Masonic Aid Assn. v. Jones, 154 Pa. 99.

And the same was held where the Masonic Mutual Association of Cleveland was incorporated under the law of Ohio. Masonic Mut. Assn. v. Jones, 154 Pa. 107.

III. Where compliance with state insurance law is required before doing business.

Under statutes requiring compliance with state insurance law, the following cases define mutual benefit companies to be insurance companies. Some merely hold that they must comply with the statutes of the state relating to insurance companies before transacting business in the state, and some go further and declare that such mutual benefit companies are not within the saving clause of a statute exempting benevolent societies, but some cases hold that some of those companies are within such exemptions while some cases restrict their attempts to do unauthorized business, where they depart from the benevolent character. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Mayre, 85 Va. 613; State, Atty. Gen., v. Farmers' & M. Mut. Benev. Assn. 18 Neb. 276; State, Beach, v. Citizens' Ben. Assn. 6 Mo. introduced by plaintiff tending to rebut testimony for defendant that Schardt was afflicted with gonorrhea in 1892. Defendant called insurance experts to testify in regard to the materiality of the facts in respect to which it was claimed that Schardt had been guilty of misrepresentation or concealment. The court permitted the experts to say whether, in their opinions, the facts misstated or concealed were material, but refused to allow them to say whether, by the usage of all insurance companies, such facts were regarded as material to the risk.

The defendant requested the court to instruct the jury to bring in a verdict for the defendant because it appeared by the undisputed evidence that Schardt's warranties of the truth of his representations in regard to facts material as a matter of law had been broken, and the policy avoided, in the following particulars, to wit: First, in that the amount of existing insurance of his life was greater than stated; second, in that he had had the syphilis; third, in that he had had a sore throat; fourth, in that he had had a chancre; fifth, in that he had had indigestion; sixth, in that his occupation was that of an embezzler, as well as bank teller. Defendant asked the same instruction on the ground that Schardt had concealed from it and its agents the fact that he was an embezzler in the sum of $100,000,—a fact claimed to be material to the risk, as a matter of law. These requests were refused by the trial court on one ground, among others,

So, the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company of Hartford was not entitled to do business under Va. act May 18, 1887, providing that such companies must deposit with the auditor a copy of their Constitution and by-laws, which must show that all indemnities to beneficiaries are in the main provided for by assessments upon all surviving members, where the company laid its regular assessment in advance of any loss, and thus created a fund out of which losses might be paid or not, as the company might decide. It was held that such company came under Va. Code, chap. 53, requiring a deposit before doing business. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Marye, 85 Va. 643.

So, a mutual or co-operative insurance company was not authorized to do business in Vermont, under Vt. Rev. Laws, § 3607, amended by act 1884, No. 45, providing that a mutual insurance company or a co-operative insurance company, association, or society, not organized under the laws of this state, shall not transact the business of said company in this state unless it has $100,000 in assets, where such company did not make such showing. Granite Mut. Aid Assn. v. Porter, 58 Vt. 581.

And the Farmers' & Mechanics' Mutual Benevolent Association was a mutual insurance company, where under its contract the subject insured was the life or health of the member who paid a certain sum at the inception of the contract fixed by the association and promised to pay assessments punctually when called for, and semi-annual dues, and at the death of a member the beneficiary was to receive a sum graduated by the number of contributing members at the date of the assessment therefore. It was held that such company could not do business without complying with Neb. act June 1, 1873, requiring a certificate of the auditor before transacting business. It was said: "The courts have with a great degree of unanimity treated all such organizations as substantially life insurance companies, applying to them and to the mutual relations of the members the rules and principles applicable to the contract of life insurance." State, Atty. Gen., v. Farmers' & M. Mut. Benev. Assn. 18 Neb. 278.

The Citizens' Benefit Association was held to be an insurance company which could not carry on its business in Missouri without complying with the statute, where its object was to give financial aid to the widows and children of deceased members, and applicants were required to be of a certain age and reside in a certain place, and the board of trustees was authorized to regulate the terms of membership and rate of initiation fee, to divide the membership into classes according to the sums to be paid on death of a fellow member, and to limit the number of members in each class, and to regulate the manner and time of payment, and the amount to be paid to the representatives of a deceased member of a class, and to provide a compensation for each applicant procured by another member, and the board of executive committee were to be paid $2 each on each attendance at their meetings. State, Beach, v. Citizens' Ben. Assn. 6 Mo. App. 163.

And the Order of International Fraternal Alliance incorporated under Md. Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 23, for social or fraternal beneficial purposes, or both, convening in assemblies or local bodies conducting the operations of their members, according to the ritual of the order, was held to be an insurance company, and amenable to Md. Code, art. 23, § 127, prohibiting insurance business in the state without fully complying with the insurance law. It was said: "A great deal of stress has been laid upon the idea that the 'ritual and lodge' features of the appellant ought to rescue it from the assault now being made against it, but the lodge system and its ritual cannot be, under the law, incorporated with an insurance business such as is now conducted by the appellant, and called 'a corporation for social or fraternal beneficial purposes or both,' and thus frustrate the provisions of the insurance laws." Order of International Fraternal Alliance v. State, 77 Md. 547.

A contract made between the Connecticut Mutual Benefit Company and its members was held not to differ in any essential particular of form or substance from an ordinary policy of mutual life insurance, where the subject insured was the life of the member and the risk was death, and the payment by the assured was fixed by the directors, and not exceeding $10 at the inception of the contract and assessments of $2 each annually, and $1 each upon the death of any member of the division to which he belonged during the risk, and the company promised to pay in case of death as many dollars as there are members in the same division the number of which is limited to 5,000, subject to no contingency but insolvency. The means of paying it were derived from assessments on other members from certificates of membership and from a guaranty fund. It was held that this was not the less a contract of mutual insurance upon the life of the assured because the amount was graduated by the number of members holding similar contracts, nor because a portion of the premiums was to be paid upon the uncertain periods of the deaths, nor because on nonpayment of assessments the contract provided no means of enforcing payment except by forfeiture. It was further held that evidence offered that the object of the organization that by the terms of the policy this was a Pennsylvania contract, and was to be construed in the light of a statute of that state which made the effect of a breach of these warranties in avoiding the policy to depend on the materiality of the fact misrepresented, or the good faith of the applicant, and that under such a construction the materiality of the fact misstated was a question for the jury, and so, also, was the good faith of the applicant. The court charged the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount of the policy unless the defendant could show that Schardt had made untrue statements, and that the facts thus misrepresented were material to the risk, or that they had been misrepresented with intent to deceive the company, and that the burden of establishing these defenses was on the defendant. The court accordingly submitted to the jury the question whether the fact that Schardt had a policy in the New York Life Insurance Company was material to the risk, and, if not material, whether the omission by Schardt to include it in his answer was made in good faith. He took the same course with respect to the other representations, leaving the question of their untruth, materiality, and good faith to the jury. The defendant excepted to so much of the charge as imposed upon the defendant the burden of showing that Schardt's failure to include in his existing insurance the New York Life policy was with intent to defraud, or that it was material to the risk, was benevolent and not speculative had no bearing upon the nature and effect of the business, and such company was required to comply with Massachusetts laws before transacting business as an insurance company. Com. v. Wetherbee, 105 Mass. 149.

And the Ancient Order of United Workmen was held to be an insurance company within the meaning of Iowa Code, § 1160, requiring a guaranteed capital of $100,000. It was said: "We are satisfied, from an examination of the record, that the primary object and purpose of the association of the Ancient Order of United Workmen is to provide a beneficiary fund to be paid upon the death of each member, and that the avowed fraternal character of the association is merely incidental thereto. In fact, we go further than this, and from the record find that one of two things is true, that is to say, either the fraternal objects of the association as avowed have been abandoned, or they never were intended to be enforced." State, Graham, v. Miller, 66 Iowa, 28.

And the Ancient Order of United Workmen was again held to be an insurance company, and its primary object life insurance, in the case of State, Graham, v. Nichols, 78 Iowa, 747. It was held that the fact that it had social objects also did not destroy its character as an insurance company, and such company was not allowed to do business in Iowa without complying with the statutes as to capital, investments, and other requirements. The constitution of the society provided that it was to protect labor, to improve the social condition, to create a fund for the benefit of its members during sickness, and in case of death to pay a sum to such person designated by each member, and the adoption of secret work to protect its members, to hold lectures, and discuss art, science, and literature.

And a contract by an association to pay at certain stated periods of time certain sums of money as endowments to living members, or in case of death to pay benefits to their beneficiaries, was held to be life insurance, and therefore the Endowment & Benevolent Association of Kansas was held not to be entitled to transact business in the state without complying with the provisions of Kan. Laws 1886, chap. 131, providing for the organization and control of mutual life insurance associations in this state. It was held that contracts to pay benefits to beneficiaries of deceased members were insurance, and contracts to pay endowments to living members were also. Endowment & Benev. Assn. v. State, 35 Kan. 253.

The Vigilant Insurance Company, a mutual indemnity association against losses from horse thieves, was held to be an insurance company, where each member paid a membership fee and annual dues to keep up the organization and pay officers' fees, and assessments were made to pay losses; therefore it was held that such company could not carry on the 88 L. R. A. business without authority from the state. State v. Vigilant Ins. Co., 30 Kan. 585.

And the Masonic Mutual Benevolent Association of Texas constituted an insurance company within the spirit and true meaning of that term, and not an association conducted in the interest of benevolence as contemplated by Tex. Rev. Stat. title 20, providing for corporations for charity or benevolence, and it was subject to state control, under Rev. Stat. art. 2971a, providing that it shall not be construed to affect or in any way apply to mutual relief associations organized under title 20, which has no capital stock and whose relief funds are created by assessments upon members, and that such organization shall be required to make an annual statement showing certain facts and salaries paid officers, and gross amount of receipts, and amount of policy holders; and that if the report is not made the company is to be deemed an insurance company conducted for profit and amenable to the laws governing such companies. And it was held that the report showed that this company was managed in the interest of its officers, and was an insurance company and not a benevolent society. Farmer v. State, 60 Tex. 561.

The Fidelity Mutual Aid Association organized under a Pennsylvania statute which authorized "insuring lives on the plan of assessment upon surviving members" without other restriction than that policy holders shall have an interest in the lives of members, was not authorized to do business in Ohio, under Ohio Rev. Stat. § 8630, providing that a company or association may be organized for the purpose of mutual protection and relief of its members, and for the payment of stipulated sums of money to the families or heirs of deceased members of such company or association, and may receive money either by voluntary donation or contribution or collect the same by assessments on its members, and that such association shall not be subject to the preceding section of this chapter. State v. Moore, 38 Ohio St. 7.

So, under N. Y. Laws 1848, chap. 819, being an act for the incorporation of benevolent, charitable, scientific, and missionary societies, authorizing any five or more persons to associate themselves for benevolent, charitable, literary, scientific, missionary, or mission or other Sabbath-school purposes, the Mutual Reliance Society was not entitled to incorporate, where the certificate stated "that the object for which the said society is formed is benevolent, by the association and co-operation of its members, by their contributions and the contributions of others, to provide a relief fund; also to aid persons of moderate pecuniary resources in obtaining from a reputable insurance company insurance on their lives, and in maintaining the necessary payments on the same; and to secure to families of persons so insured an immediate advance of funds in case of death." It was said that "it is evidently and requested upon this subject the following charge, which the court refused: "The undisputed evidence shows that Schardt omitted to disclose, in his answer to question 6, A, that, in addition to the insurance therein stated, he had been insured, and was then insured, and had a policy, in the New York Life Insurance Company, for $5,000, which it was his duty to have done. The presumption is that he knew of this additional insurance. In fact, it is not controverted that he did. The presumption, also, is that he intentionally suppressed the fact. The presumption, also, is that the question, answer, and information sought by the question, as well as that disclosed as that suppressed, were material. The defendant makes out a prima facie defense by referring to the question and answer, and proving the omission to state in his answer the policy in the New York Life Insurance Company; and the burden is on the plaintiff to show that the omission was not intentional, and that the matter suppressed was not material." Upon the question of concealment of the fact, the court charged the jury as follows: "It is again insisted, as the court understands the line of defense, that, in addition to the answers which it is alleged are false, that the insured concealed from the insurance company a fact about which he was not asked in the policy, and that by reason of that concealment the policy is avoided. That fact is that he was at the time a defaulter to the bank of which he was an officer. Now, it is not insisted that this a corporation for business purposes, having in view pecuniary gain and profit to the incorporators. It may contemplate the promotion of the temporal interests of others, but such object is merely incidental to the chief end of the association." People, Blossom, v. Nelson, 46 N. Y. 477.

In State, Atty. Gen., v. Northwestern Mut. Life Stock Assn. 16 Neb. 549, it was said that under Neb. Laws 1883, 236, 237, authorizing any number of persons not exceeding two hundred to make mutual pledges and give valid obligations to each other for their own insurance from loss by death; but such association shall in no case insure life except that of a member, nor pay salary or compensation, and shall receive no premium and declare no dividends, —the statute was evidently intended for neighborhoods, benevolent societies, etc., and was never intended to authorize such an association to do a general insurance business.

And the Merchants' Mutual Benefit Society, an association having for its object to give financial aid to the widows and children of deceased members or to such purposes as members should direct by their last will, providing a fund for this purpose from assessments and entrance fees, was held to be a mutual insurance company. Mo. act March 8, 1879, relating to benevolent, religious, and educational associations, adding the privilege of providing for relief of families and dependents of deceased members and for assisting the sick and exempting such societies from the law relating to insurance companies, was repealed by the act of May 18, 1879. State, Atty. Gen., v. Merchants' Exch. Mut. Benev. Assn. 72 Mo. 146.

So, a corporation organized to promote the well being of the members, and to furnish aid to a member's family in case of his death, where no moral or social prerequisite was required for membership, but only conditions of age and health, and which provided no benefit except in case of death, and collected funds for this purpose by assessment in case of death, was held to be a mutual insurance company and subject to the insurance laws of the state, and not a benevolent or charitable association within the meaning of Mo. Secs. Laws 1881, p. 87. State v. Brawnner, 15 Mo. App. 597.

In Foster v. Moulton, 35 Minn. 453, where the association did not comply with the statute so as to become an insurance corporation, and it was contended that it was duly incorporated as a benevolent society, under Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 34, title 3, providing for the organization of corporations other than those for pecuniary profit, including benevolent societies or associations for mutual improvement in any art or science or for literature or social culture, it was held that it was no more a benevolent society than any mutual insurance company or other mutual company, or any partnership by which one member undertakes to do something for the pecuniary advantage of another member, in consideration of the undertaking of the latter to do the like thing for him. It was held that the undertaking was not in any sense benevolent but was for a quid pro quo; it was paid for, and the association involved in this case was in substance for the purpose of mutual insurance.

And in an action to prevent a benevolent company from doing an insurance business, where it was incorporated under Ill. Rev. Stat. 1874, chap. 290, act April 18, 1872, and it was claimed to be exempt under § 81 providing that societies intending to benefit the widows, orphans, heirs, or devisees of deceased members and members who have received a permanent disability without any annual dues or premiums while the members receive no money as profit or otherwise except for permanent disability, shall not be deemed insurance companies, it was held that this exemption did not apply where the object was the benefit of members, and the pecuniary benefits were enjoyed, not by the widows, but by appointees of deceased members, and by certain of the members generally, and not members who had received a permanent disability. Golden Rule v. People, Swigert, 118 Ill. 402.

The Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York, organized under an act for the incorporation of societies and clubs for certain lawful purposes, and the purpose being "the mutual benefit of ourselves and all others who may become members" was a life insurance company, and was not exempt under Ky. act March 6, 1876, providing that all Masonic Orders, Odd Fellows Associations, and all lodges of Ancient Order of United Workmen, Knights of Honor, and all other associations for the sole purpose of mutual protection and relief of its members and for the payment of stipulated sums of money to the families or heirs of deceased members, are hereby declared not to be insurance companies in the sense and meaning of the general life-insurance law of this state, and are exempt from its provisions. It was held that the application for the certificate in this case was similar to that of an ordinary life insurance company, and that it was an insurance company attempting to assume the sacred name and purpose of a benevolent and charitable association, while the distribution of profits was disguised by designating them payments of salaries, fees, and expenses which appeared enormous in view of the payment of losses reported, and a fine was imposed for doing business without a license. Sherman v. Com. 82 Ky. 102.

So, the National Association of the Farmers' & Mechanic's Mutual Aid Association was held to be a mutual life insurance company on the assessment plan and subject to Kan. Laws 1885, chap. 131, although the declared purpose was to promote charity as well as the social and moral advancement of its members, who were classified as social and beneficiary members, and the social members were not required to pay assessments or contribute to the

is a false answer to anything asked here, because in the policy and in the application there is no question made upon that point at all; and, in the absence of any question at all upon the point, it constitutes no part of the written application or policy, and is therefore not governed by the same rule as stated to you as governing the other propositions. If the answers to the written questions were false and material, as explained to you, that would avoid the policy, without more, but in respect to a fact about which no question is asked, in order that the concealment from the company of such a fact as that should avoid the policy, it must have been intentionally concealed; and the omission to state it because the insured did not think it material, or the entire omission to speak of it because not asked about it, or because it was at the time not recollected or was forgotten, or its omission in any manner in good faith, would not avoid the policy. For the concealment of a fact such as that, outside of anything asked in the policy to have that effect, as stated, it must have been intentional." To this action of the court the defendant took the following exceptions: "(4) Said counsel next then and there excepted to so much of said charge as instructs the jury that before the failure of John Schardt, the insured, to disclose to the defendant company the fact of his defalcation to the plaintiff bank, at the time of the application and policy in question, could be available as a defense to his action, the concealment must have been intentional beneficiary fund, but the main object was to contract with its beneficiary members by which they were to pay a membership fee and an assessment upon the death or permanent disability of another beneficiary member of the section to which he belonged to be collected and paid by levy of an assessment. Kan. Laws 1885, chap. 131, providing that this act shall not apply to any association of religious societies now existing or under the supervision of a grand or supreme lodge, nor to any class of mechanics, express, telegraph, or railroad employees formed for the mutual benefit of the members thereof and their families exclusively, was held not to exempt the association where it was not shown that it was a secret society existing when the law was enacted, and that fact that it was under the supervision of a grand or supreme lodge was not enough to exempt it where it was not shown to be a secret society. State, Bradford, v. National Asso. of the Farmers' & M. Mut. Aid Asso. 35 Kan. 51.

In State, Churchill, v. Trubey, 37 Minn. 97; State, Clapp, v. Critchett, 37 Minn. 13, it was held that the Single Men's Endowment Association of Minnesota, which was a marriage aid association, whose purpose it was to endow the wife of each member with a sum of money equal to as many dollars as there were members of the association to be raised by assessment on them, was not a benevolent society, and could not be incorporated under Minn. Stat. 1878, chap. 84, § 166, providing for the incorporation of societies for benevolence, or instruction, or mutual improvement, or for literary or social culture purposes.

A beneficial association organized under Pa. act May 23, 1891, Pub. Laws, 107, Am. act April 22, 1874, authorizing the maintenance of a society for beneficial or protective purposes to its members, from funds collected therein, and to contract to pay not exceeding $250 in the event of death, providing that this act shall not apply to fraternal, benevolent, charitable, or secret societies, issuing beneficiary certificates or paying benefits to their membership through the lodge system, or to insurance or relief associations for the exclusive benefit of employees or religious associations; but shall only apply to companies employing agents and doing "a general public insurance business," was held to be doing an insurance business where it issued death benefit certificates for $250; but this was authorized by this act. Com. v. Keystone Ben. Asso. 171 Pa. 465.

And under Pa. act 1874, providing for the incorporation of a society for benevolent or protective purposes to its members from funds collected therein, no authority was conferred upon a corporation to extend its operation by means of agents or so-called subordinate lodges which are merely agencies called by another name throughout and beyond the state for the pecuniary advantage of the officers and managers, and therefore a judgment of ouster was granted against the Order of Vesta 88 L. R. A.

which was organized under the act of 1874, and which society organized a central corporation which undertook to levy assessments upon and assess benefits to beneficiary members of subordinate lodges who were excluded from membership in the national lodge. It was said: "These certificates are based on an application, the form of which is not given, but, from the fact that it is to contain the result of an examination by the medical examiner of a subordinate lodge, and is subject to the approval of the 'national' medical examiner, we infer that it is substantially like an ordinary application for a life insurance policy." Com. v. Order of Vesta, 2 Pa. Dist. R. 234.

And the National Indemnity & Endowment Company was not a beneficiary association within Pa. act April 29, 1874, Pub. Laws, 74, §2, ¶9, providing for the maintenance of a society for beneficial or protective purposes to its members from funds collected therein, where the only persons likely to be benefited by the scheme set forth in the charter were the officers; therefore a judgment of incorporation was revoked. Re National Indemnity & E. Co. 143 Pa. 450.

And the Masonic Mutual Aid Association was held to be an insurance company where the principal object was to secure to each member of the association on his death, for his beneficiary or representatives, a certain sum, and the membership was limited to masons in good standing who were not over fifty years of age and could pass the required medical examination; therefore it was held that such association was required to pay to the state a tax on its gross assessments before it could do business, and was not exempt under S. D. Insurance Laws, § 53, exempting from the payment of this tax secret, benevolent, or fraternal societies. It was further held that this was not a secret society although it only insured Masons, and if the word "Mason" was eliminated from the association, its primary and only purpose was that of life insurance for its members. It was also held that it was not a fraternal order because fraternal orders and associations usually provide for sick benefits and funeral expenses, without regard to the age or physical condition of the member at the time of admission. Masonic Aid Asso. v. Taylor, 2 S. D. 324.

The Fraternal Alliance, a secret order organized to cultivate social and fraternal relations and to furnish aid to the disabled, all aid to be by voluntary subscription, was held to be an insurance company, but to have the right to do business in Michigan without being under the control of the commissioner of insurance, under How. (Mich.) Stat. chap. 131, § 4225, providing that no company shall be at liberty to transact the business of life insurance within the state until such company shall have deposited with the state treasurer $100,000 in securities, and § 4244 providing that all cor-on the part of the said insured, and that, if his failure to divulge the fact arose from any of the causes stated in said charge, that such defense could not be established; and said counsel, insisting that the purpose, design, or intention of the insured in withholding the fact from the knowledge of the company is not material in making out said defense, except to the opinion of the court in its decision to the contrary."

Messrs. F. C. Maury and J. B. Daniel, for plaintiff in error:

The failure to include the facts in the answer of Schardt to the question in the application made that answer untrue because the question called for a statement of all the occupations in which Schardt had been, and was then, engaged; and his answer did not communicate to the company one of the occupations (to wit, that of a practised embezzler) in which he was then and had been engaged. Though an apparently complete answer, it was nevertheless incomplete and therefore untrue. The company had a right to rely upon it as a full and truthful answer, and act upon it as such.

porations, associations, partnerships, or individuals doing business involving an insurance, guaranty contract, or pledge for the payment of annuities or endowments, or for the payment of moneys to families or representatives, or certificate holders or members, shall be considered and be deemed to be life insurance companies within the meaning of the laws relating to life insurance within this state, and § 4246 excepting mutual benefit corporations and other benevolent associations organized under the act of April 3, 1869, and Laws of 1883, chap. 181, § 5, providing that this act shall not be construed to apply to any secret or fraternal society, lodge, council, or association now doing business in this state, which is under the supervision of a grand or supreme body and furnishes insurance to its members, but neither pays any commissions nor employs any paid agents, whether organized under the laws of this or any other state; but such associations shall be authorized to transact business in this state and not be subject to the provisions of this or any other act. Kensenhouse v. Seeley, 72 Mich. 608.

In State, Royal Arcanum, v. Benton, 35 Neb. 463, it was said that certificates of indemnity issued by the Royal Arcanum Society were in form and substance contracts of insurance. But it was held that such societies were not amenable to Neb. Comp. Stat. chap. 43, requiring payment of fees to the auditor by license, as they were exempted under Sees. Laws 1887, chap. 18, being "An Act to Exempt Secret Societies and Associations from the Requirements of Chapter 16 of the Compiled Statutes of 1885, to Define the Duties, Powers, and Obligations of Such Societies and Associations, and to Provide Penalties for Violations Thereof."

Under Kan. Laws 1871, p. 248, § 78, providing that the provisions of this act shall not apply to life insurance companies organized on the co-operative plan, the Bankers & Merchants' Mutual Benefit Association was held to be an insurance company organized upon the co-operative plan and exempt from the provisions of the law of 1871, where the corporation had no stock, proposed no accumulation of assets to pay law suits, held no reserve but collected an assessment from its members on a death, and paid the amount to a beneficiary. The charter provided that the purpose was the creation of a fund by mutual pledges and obligations of its members with each other for their own insurance from loss by the death of its members; the preservation of the fund by investment in bonds and distribution among the families or beneficiaries of deceased members, and provided that it shall have no stock, insure no life except members, receive no premium, nor make any dividend, and the private property of its members shall be exempt from corporate debts. State v. Bankers' & M. Mut. Ben. Assn. 23 Kan. 499.

Life Association was held to be a contract of insurance, where the so-called member contracted to pay an admission fee and annual dues of specified amounts and a stated assessment for each death in the class to which he belonged, in consideration of which the company agreed to pay his beneficiary named the assessments collected (less certain deductions) not exceeding the amount of insurance named in the certificate. It was further held that under Ohio Rev. Stat. § 3630, authorizing such corporation for the mutual protection and relief of its members, and also for the payment of stipulated sums of money "to the families or heirs" of deceased members, an association contracting to pay to a person who was not of his family should be ousted from doing business. State v. Standard Life Assn. 38 Ohio St. 281.

In State, Atty. Gen., v. Central Ohio Mut. Relief Assn. 29 Ohio St. 399, it was said that it had been held by that court that mutual relief associations incorporated under Ohio act February 23, 1875, are not subject to the statutes of this state relating to life insurance and life insurance companies. But this did not determine what will constitute a proper organization under the act, and a judgment of ouster was awarded where such company had issued sixty-four certificates of membership to one person who was not a member, upon the lives of strangers in whom the insured had no insurable interest. The association had no power either to make such contracts or to issue certificates of membership thereon. It was held the only beneficiaries for whom it had power to provide were the families or heirs of its members.

Where an association sought a mandamus to compel the issuance of a license to do business it was granted, and it was also held that under Wis. Laws 1891, chap. 418, regulating mutual beneficial and fraternal corporations, societies, orders, and associations providing insurance on the assessment plan, the Covenant Mutual Benefit Association of Illinois was "a beneficiary association furnishing life insurance upon the assessment plan, within the meaning of the act in question. The mere fact that the relator was authorized to receive calls or premiums in advance does not destroy its character as such insurance association." State, Covenant Mut. Ben. Assn., v. Root, 38 Wis. 667, 19 L. R. A. 271.

Under the Friendly Society act 1875, § 23, subsecs. 2, 7, and § 4, and life insurance company's act 1870, § 2, providing that no society (including any person or persons not registered under the friendly society act, which issues policies of insurance on human life or grants assurance on any one life for a less sum than £20, and receives premiums or contributions by collectors at less intervals than two months, and who assures the payment of money on the death of children under ten years of age) shall pay on the death of a child under ten years of age except to — upon the production of a certificate of

It was clearly Schardt's duty in response to the question to have stated all of the occupations in which at the time of the answer he was employed and which he had previously followed, and if he was or had been engaged in two, and concealed either, he should rather have withheld the more innocent and less risky one and disclosed the more hazardous one, since the evident object of the question was to ascertain the risk to which the company would be exposed by reason of the occupation of the man whose life was proposed for insurance.

Hurtman v. Keystone Ins. Co. 21 Pa. 467; United Brethren Mut. Aid Soc. v. White, 100 Pa. 12; May, Ins. § 806.

It was the duty of Schardt to have made a full and fair disclosure of the material fact thus peculiarly known to him and thus concealed by him, and his failure to do so was a breach of an implied condition of the contract that avoided the policy.

death, where it was contended that a society registered under the company's acts 1862-90 did not issue, and were not liable under policies of assurance,—it was held that they were properly convicted where they paid money to a member on the death of her child under ten years of age without the production by her of a registered certificate. In this case the subscription card was claimed not to be a policy of life insurance but issued to inform the subscriber how he stood, and that it did not contain any contract of insurance. Newbold Friendly Soc. v. Barlow [1893] 2 Q. B. 128.

But there are some cases where the associations are purely benevolent, or held to be within the saving clause of the statute. State v. Taylor, 56 N. J. L. 49; Durlan v. Central Verein of Hermann's Soehne, 7 Daly, 168; Louisville German Mut. F. Ins. Asso. v. Com. 9 Bush, 394; State v. Whitmore, 75 Wis. 232; State, Atty.-Gen., v. Aid Asso. 94 Pa. 481; State, Clapp. v. Federal Investment Co. 48 Minn. 110.

Under N. J. Pamph. Laws 1869, p. 174, prohibiting any contract of insurance of any kind, and also the transaction of the business of insurance of any kind whatsoever, save under the provisions of that act, a contract made by the Commonwealth Benevolent Association was not a contract of insurance where the association confined its agreements to the payment of sick benefits and burial expenses. It was said: "Mutual associations for the purpose of securing, inter alia, sick benefits and burial expenses are benevolent institutions in the strictest sense of the term, whereas a contract for life insurance is a mere business undertaking entirely divorced from all charitable considerations." State v. Taylor, 56 N. J. L. 49.

And a benevolent society like the Sons of Hermann and its Central Verein was not subject to N. Y. Laws 1840, chap. 80, and Laws 1858, chap. 187, empowering a wife to cause the life of her husband to be insured; and it was said that it was doubtful if it would be contended "that the Central Verein was subject to the control of the superintendent of the department of insurance, and obliged to conform to the laws respecting life insurance companies. The Verein is a corporation, but it is not restricted by law as to the methods of accomplishing the benevolent designs to promote which it was organized. It issues no policies." The question involved was as to whether a man could designate a woman other than his wife as his beneficiary. Durlan v. Central Verein of Hermann's Soehne, 7 Daly, 168.

And the Louisville German Mutual Fire Insurance Association and German Washington Mutual Fire Association were not insurance companies, in 38 L. R. A.

the sense in which these terms were used in Ky. act March 12, 1870, providing for the incorporation and regulation of fire, marine, health, accident, live stock, and all other except life insurance companies, where the companies were chartered in 1856 (§ 1890), and the contracts between the various members were simply application of indemnity against loss by fire, the performance of which was secured by the pledge of the property by each member to the extent of his own insurance, and they had no capital stock either in cash or premium notes. It was further held that the provisions of the act of 1870, prohibiting mutual insurance until two hundred applicants and premiums amounting to $100,000 be secured, did not apply. Louisville German Mut. F. Ins. Asso. v. Com. 9 Bush, 394.

And under Wis. Rev. Stat. 1878, § 1978, defining what are insurance corporations, and Laws 1880, chap. 240, § 4, requiring a certificate of authority before an agent effects insurance in this state, the National Benevolent Association of Minneapolis, which was a fraternal benevolent association for Odd Fellows upon the co-operative or assessment plan, was exempt under Laws 1879, chap. 204, § 1, providing that secret beneficial, charitable, or benevolent orders of Free Masons, Odd Fellows, etc., are hereby declared not to be life insurance companies in the sense and meaning of the laws of this state relating to life insurance and life insurance companies, and that such societies, orders, or associations are and shall hereafter be exempt from the provisions of said general law as aforesaid. State v. Whitmore, 75 Wis. 332.

So, the Mutual Protection Association organized under Ohio act April 20, 1872, 69 Ohio Laws, 82, authorizing associations for the purpose of mutual protection and relief of their members and for the payment of stipulated sums of money to the families or heirs of deceased members of such association, was not subject to the statute relating to life insurance and life insurance companies, under the act of February 23, 1875, 72 Ohio Laws, 23, § 3, providing that all rights accrued and all associations formed under the original act shall survive and be subject to and governed only by the provisions of said original act as hereby amended, and in no manner subject to the laws of this state relating to life insurance companies. State, Atty. Gen., v. Mutual Protection Asso. 26 Ohio St. 19.

And the Supreme Council of the Order of Chosen Friends was not required to comply with the general insurance laws, where N. Y. Laws 1881, chap. 256, provided that all associations and societies which may issue any certificate or make any agreement with their members whereby upon the decease or sickness or other physical disability of a member, any money or other benefit or aid is to be paid to such member or others dependent upon him,

If the fact was material as it certainly was, and if Schardt was conscious of the defalcation, as he certainly was, then whether the failure to disclose it was the result of stupidity, mistake, inadvertence, or any other cause, the concealment avoided the policy.

Walden v. Louisiana Ins. Co. 13 La. 186. 82 Am. Dec. 116; Bebee v. Hartford County Mut. F. Ins. Co. 25 Conn. 59, 65 Am. Dec. 558; Bufe v. Turner, 6 Taunt. 888; *Curry v. Commonwealth Ins. ley, 6 Taunt. 186; Bliss, Life Ins. §§ 55, 66, 72; Lindenau v. Desborough, 8 Barn. & C. 586.

The concealment of the policy of the New York Life falsified the answer to the same extent as if Schardt had expressly denied therein the existence of any insurance other than that specified in the answer.

The nondisclosure in question was a breach of the warranty and avoided the policy.

or designated beneficiary, which money or aid is derived from donations or fees, dues and assessments collected from members, and which funds and business are limited to such benevolent or charitable uses, shall be subject only to the provisions of this act, and the certificate in this case was to pay a member on reaching seventy-five years of age which was held to be a physical disability under the statute. Supreme Council O. of C. F. v. Fairman, 62 How. Pr. 386.

And the National Mutual Aid Association of Columbus, Ohio, was held to possess some of the features of an insurance company, but was not a mutual insurance company so as to require compliance with Pa. act, April 4, 1873, imposing a penalty on foreign insurance companies for transacting business in the state without authority of law. It was said that in Ohio, in State, Atty. Gen., v. Mutual Protective Asso. 25 Ohio St. 19, it was held not to be a mutual insurance company, and if it was not so held it would be exempt under Pa. act May 1, 1878, Pamph. Laws, 53, § 54, providing that this act and the act of which this is a supplement shall not apply to beneficial associations that provide aid for the family or heirs of a deceased member, whether insurance policies containing a guaranteed sum of insurance or not, nor to associations issuing policies not containing a guaranteed sum of insurance. Com. v. National Mut. Aid Asso. 94 Pa. 481.

In Fawcett v. Supreme Sitting O. of I. H. 64 Conn. 170, 24 L. R. A. 815, it was held that the Supreme Sitting of the Order of Iron Hall was not controlled by Conn. Gen. Stat. § 2802, requiring insurance companies to have authority from the insurance commissioners, at it was exempt under § 2808, providing that every secret fraternal society is excepted from the operation of that statute, and this corporation was held to answer both of those descriptions, as under its constitution secret work was one of the functions of the Supreme Sitting, as the branches were to meet with a "watchman" at the outer and a "vidette" at the inner door. But in the opinion of Hamersley, J., who concurred in the result, it was said that "secret or fraternal society" includes only the well-known class of associations for dispensing aid or benefits to their members, and that the exception did not apply to a corporation doing an assessment insurance business distinct from the benevolent operation of any secret or fraternal society, and that it would hardly be claimed that the mere word "secret" was efficacious to exclude from the operation of the act any corporation that may call its janitor a "watchman" and its door-keeper a "vidette."

The Federal Investment Company was not an insurance company of any kind where an admission fee was charged and monthly dues during membership, of which the admission fee and 15 per cent of the dues were to pay agents, commissions, and the expenses, and 15 per cent went into a reserve fund, and the balance constituted a maturity fund and was paid out to the member holding the oldest outstanding certificate and then he ceased to be a member. It was held that this association was not amenable to Minn. Laws 1888, chap. 184, providing for a corporation transacting life, casualty, or endowment insurance upon the assessment plan. State, Clapp, v. Federal Investment Co. 48 Minn. 110.

IV. Where the question is in regard to jurisdiction.

It is generally held under statutes providing for jurisdiction in actions against life insurance companies, that benevolent associations are controlled by the general insurance laws; but there are exceptional cases in Illinois. Dixon v. Order of Railway Conductors of America, 49 Fed. Rep. 910; Miner v. Michigan Mut. Ben. Asso. 68 Mich. 888; Kentucky Mut. Security Fund Co. v. Logan, 90 Ky. 364; Railway Pass. & Freight Conductors' Mut. Aid & Ben. Asso. v. Robinson, 147 Ill. 128; Covenant Mut. Ben. Asso. v. Baldwin, 49 Ill. App. 202; Supreme Council, A. L. of H. v. Larmour, 81 Tex. 71.

So, under Wis. Rev. Stat. § 1953, requiring every life insurance company not organized under the laws of this state to designate an attorney upon whom process may be served, and § 1977, providing that whoever solicits insurance or transmits an application or makes any contract for insurance or collects any premium in so doing shall be held to be an agent of such corporation, the Order of Railway Conductors of America was held to be a mutual insurance company within the provisions of such act where it was under the control of the grand division composed of those members of the order who choose to participate in its benefits, and insured its members against death and total disability from accident and disease. Dixon v. Order of Railway Conductors of America, 49 Fed. Rep. 910.

And the Michigan Mutual Benefit Association of Hillsdale was an insurance company under How. (Mich.) Stat. § 4360, providing for an action against insurance companies in the circuit court of the county in which the plaintiff resides, if the company issues policies or takes risks in such counties, where the company was organized under How. Stat. (Mich.) chap. 118, authorizing any number of persons not less than five to become a body corporate and political for the purpose of securing to the family or heirs of any member upon his death a certain sum of money to be paid by such corporation either out of its funds or by an assessment upon its members. In this case the articles of association provided that members should pay a certain amount upon each assessment for death benefits which shall not increase with the age of the member, and its by-laws prescribed the manner in which persons could become members. Miner v. Michigan Mut. Ben. Asso. 63 Mich. 333.

If not a warranty then the answer is a written representation incorporated with and made part of the policy and the omission to include the additional insurance in the answer was a substantial misrepresentation or a substantial concealment tantamount to a misrepresentation, and attended by the same consequences.

May, Ins. § 158; Phœnix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Raddin, 120 U. S. 183, 30 L. ed. 644; Towne v. Fitchburg Mut. F. Ins. Co. 7 Allen, 51; Fire Asso. of Philadelphia v. Williamson, 26 Pa. 196.

Whether the nondisclosure be regarded as proof of an express misrepresentation or a concealment tantamount thereto, in neither case can the materiality of the omitted fact nor the motive or intent of Schardt in misrepresenting or concealing the fact be made the subject of inquiry any more than if it was a breach of warranty.

And the Kentucky Mutual Security Fund Company was an insurance company within the meaning of Ky. Code, § 71, providing that an action against an insurance company may be brought in the county in which its office or principal place of business is situated, or if it arises out of a transaction with an agent of such corporation it may be brought in the county in which such transaction took place, although the charter provided that "the said company being of a purely benevolent character, it shall not be subject to the laws of this state governing life insurance companies, except as herein provided." Kentucky Mut. Security Fund Co. v. Logan, 90 Ky. 364.

And the Railroad Conductors' Benefit Association was an insurance company within the Illinois act April 3, 1873, providing for jurisdiction of the circuit court of the county where the plaintiff resides, in actions against life insurance companies, notwithstanding the act of April 18, 1872, amended May 22, 1883, providing that associations and societies intended to benefit widows, orphans, heirs, and devisees of deceased members thereof, and members who have received a permanent disability, and where no annual dues or premiums are required, and where the members shall receive no money as profit or otherwise, except for permanent disability, shall not be deemed insurance companies. It was said that the legislative intention was merely to exempt mutual benefit societies from the duty of complying with the general insurance law, and to substitute therefor a code for their regulation. Railway Pass. & Freight Conductors' Mut. Aid & Ben. Asso. v. Robinson, 147 Ill. 138.

This case disapproved the case of Rood v. Railway Pass. & Freight Conductors' Mut. Ben. Asso. 31 Fed. Rep. 63, which held that a similar association organized under the same act was purely a voluntary association, and under its constitution the refusal of the directors to make an assessment because the assured was delinquent was final.

And under Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 110, § 3, providing that an action against a life insurance company may be brought in the county where the plaintiff resides, and chap. 32, § 81, providing that associations and societies which are intended to benefit the widows, orphans, heirs, and devisees of deceased members thereof and members who have received a permanent disability, and where no annual dues or premiums are required, and where the members shall receive no money as profit or otherwise except for permanent disability, shall not be deemed insurance companies, the jurisdiction attached where the plea did not show that the members received no profit, and did not aver that the funds derived from mortuary calls were not in excess of what was necessary to provide the benefits for which the association was organized. Covenant Mut. Ben. Asso. v. Baldwin, 49 Ill. App. 203.

Neither does the materiality of a fact misrepresented in or concealed from an answer to a specific question, nor the effect of such false statement or omission upon the contract, depend upon an express stipulation in the policy, application, or condition (sometimes annexed) declaring the policy void for misrepresentations or concealments.

In Covenant Mut. Ben. Asso. v. Baldwin, 49 Ill. App. 203, it was said that in Northwestern Life Asso. v. Stout, 32 Ill. App. 31, the association was exempt, but the plea in this case did not bring the defendant within the exemption.

And where the question was as to jurisdiction it was held that the Supreme Council American Legion of Honor was an insurance company, and that an answer to the merits waived the question of jurisdiction. Supreme Council, A. L. of H. v. Larmour, 81 Tex. 71.

In State v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. 69 Wis. 76, where the question was as to the right of a non-resident mutual accident association to do business in the state, it was said that it is claimed that the views in this case conflicted with the decision in State v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. 67 Wis. 624. This was a case where the statute giving jurisdiction was held to apply. The court says: "It is true it is said in that case that § 1964 applies to every life or accident insurance company doing business in this state. This remark, however, must be considered in connection with the facts and case in which it was made. It was perfectly correct, considered in relation to the question decided there; but cannot control our judgment here, where the question is whether the last clause of § 1954, which imposes a penalty for a failure to do certain acts, applies to a nonresident corporation which has never been licensed to do business in this state."

But in Union Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Riel, 38 Ill. App. 414, a plea to the jurisdiction was sustained under Ill. practice act, § 3, providing that the circuit court of the county where the plaintiff may reside shall have jurisdiction in all actions against life insurance companies incorporated or doing business in the state, and the company was organized under Starr & C. Ill. Stat. 1250, § 9, providing that all corporations organized for the purpose of furnishing life, accident, or permanent disability, indemnity, or mortuary benefit on the assessment plan in accordance with the 1st section of this act, shall not be deemed insurance companies or subject to the laws of this state relating thereto. It was held that the legislature has the power to define what shall or shall not be deemed or held to be insurance companies in this state, and that this company was not a corporation falling within the class of life insurance companies, and was expressly exempted by statute, and the service of summons was illegal.

May, Ins. § 195; 1 Wood, Fire Ins. § 120, pp. 300, 301; Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Radcliff, 120 U. S. 189, 30 L. ed. 646; Towne v. Fitchburg Mut. F. Ins. Co. 7 Allen, 53; *Campbell v. The question relates to matters intrinsically and essentially, as well as contractually, material and important, and the fact omitted from the answer thereto had a material bearing upon the contract and upon the risk assumed, as matter of law, independently of contract; and its materiality was, moreover, established by the uncontradicted testimony in the case.

And in Northwestern Life Asso. v. Stout, 32 Ill. App. 31, under Ill. act April 3, 1873, practice act, § 3, providing that the circuit court of the county wherein the plaintiff resides shall have jurisdiction over all actions against life insurance companies, and Laws 1883, p. 74, § 31, providing that associations and societies which are intended to benefit the widows, orphans, heirs, and devisees of deceased members thereof, and members who have received a permanent disability, and where no annual dues or premiums are required, and where the members shall receive no money as profit or otherwise except for permanent disability, shall not be deemed insurance companies, the Northwestern Life Insurance Company was not deemed an insurance company within the provisions of the practice act so as to give jurisdiction. It was said that whether or not the associations described in the act of 1883 are in any sense insurance companies is immaterial, and the legislature could not change the effect by their declaration, and it did not assume to do so, but simply declared they shall not be deemed such.

V. Under statutes exempting benevolent societies.

Under statutes exempting benevolent societies from the operation of certain insurance laws, some cases notwithstanding such statute have defined such associations to be insurance companies owing to the business carried on by such benevolent society, which cases are as follows:

Under Mass. Stat. 1890, chap. 341, amending § 8 of the insurance law, providing that any corporation duly organized as aforesaid, and which does not employ paid agents in soliciting or procuring business other than in preliminary organization of local branches, and which conducts its business as a fraternal society on the lodge system, may provide for weekly payments during disability or pay a benefit to a member or his family as shall be fixed by the by-laws, a corporation incorporated for the purpose of doing an insurance business could not claim the benefit of this act, where it employed agents in soliciting or procuring business other than in the preliminary organization of the local branches. Fogg v. Supreme Lodge, U. O. of G. L. 155 Mass. 431.

And in Supreme Council, A. L. of H. v. Larmour, 81 Tex. 71, where it was held that the policy was an insurance contract and the defendant was an insurance company, it was further held that such company was not subject to the penalty under Tex. Rev. Stat. art. 2953, providing the penalty of 12 per cent damages for failure to pay loss, as act 1885, act. 2971a, provided that "nothing in this title shall be construed to affect or in any way apply to mutual relief associations . . . organized under the laws of any other state, which have no capital stock, and whose relief funds are created and sustained by assessment made upon members of the association." It was held that "the purpose of this article seems to be to declare, in effect, that although a mutual relief association of the class to which plaintiff in error belongs may make an insurance contract which is substantially a life insurance policy, and that to that extent it may be, as was found by the court, an insurance company, still, if it was such an association as is described in that article, it would be relieved of the penalty."

And the Kennebec Masonic Mutual Association was not such a corporation as is provided by Me. Rev. Stat. chap. 55, § 5, providing that no corporation organized for charitable or benevolent purposes shall sue any of its members for dues or contributions of any kind, or be sued by any members for any benefit or sum due him; but all such rights and benefits, dues and liabilities, shall be regulated and enforced only in accordance with its by-laws. It was said: "If the prevalent purpose and nature of the association, of whatever name, be that of insurance, the benevolent or charitable results to its beneficiaries would not change its legal character. And that this association et id omne genus are mutual life insurance companies, we entertain no doubt whatever." Bolton v. Bolton, 73 Me. 290.

And the Bankers' Life Association organized under Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 34, tit. 3, associating male persons for the purpose of obtaining employment while living, and at their death for securing and rendering pecuniary assistance in a stated amount to their families by means of assessments upon the survivors, having no capital stock, was an insurance society or association doing business on the co-operative or assessment plan, and exempted by Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 34, § 368, providing that all associations or secret orders, such as Masons and other benevolent or fraternal co-operative societies, associated or incorporated for the sole purpose of mutual protection and relief to its members and for the payment of stipulated sums of money to the family of deceased members, are hereby declared not to be insurance in the sense and meaning of the general life insurance laws of the state, and they are and shall be henceforth exempt from the provisions of said general insurance law and are exempt from garnishment for a debt of a member under § 369, providing such exemption when a benevolent association or society sets apart or appropriates a beneficiary fund. Brown v. Balfour, 46 Minn. 68, 12 L. R. A. 373.

In Rockhold v. Canton Masonic Mut. Benev. Soc. 129 Ill. 440, 2 L. R. A. 420, where an endowment certificate was issued by an association organized under Ill. Rev. Stat. 1874, chap. 32, § 30, providing that as sociations and societies intended to benefit widows, orphans, heirs, and devisees of the deceased members where no annual dues are required, and members shall receive no profit, shall not be deemed insurance companies, it was held that an endowment policy was a species of life insurance, while the undertaking under the provisions of the statute was not to be deemed insurance, and the obligation was ultra vires and void.

In Rockhold v. Canton Masonic Mut. Benev. Soc. 129 Ill. 440, 2 L. R. A. 420, affirming Canton Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc. v. Rockhold, 26 Ill. App. 141, it was held that a recovery could not be had upon a certificate in a mutual benevolent society, which promised to pay the member on his arriving at seventy years of age, as such contract was void for want of power in the association. It was further held that the contract was one of insurance and prohibited by Ill. Laws 1869, p. 142, providing that an insurance company must have a guaranteed capital of $100,000 before issuing a policy; and it was further held under Ill. act March 28, 1874, providing that associations and societies intended to benefit widows, heirs, etc., where no annual dues or premiums are required and where the members shall receive no money as profit or otherwise, shall not be deemed insurance companies, that the certificate would be authorized for the benefit of the widow, orphans, and heirs; but the law was unchanged with reference to the clause in the certificate which obligated the payment to the member on arriving at seventy years of age, and that such an association could not issue a certificate to that effect without complying with the insurance laws.

In Rockhold v. Canton Masonic Mut. Benev. Soc. 129 Ill. 410, 2 L. R. A. 420, it was said that it is a misapprehension of what was decided in Commercial League Asso. v. People, Needles, 90 Ill. 166, and Martin v. Stubbings, 126 Ill. 387, to say that Ill. act 1869, in relation to life insurance, had no application to beneficiary certificates like those issued by the Canton Masonic Mutual Benevolent Society, providing for the payment to the member while living on reaching a certain age.

Where the question was as to the assignability of a certificate in the Knights Templars' & Masons' Life Indemnity Company, organized under Ill. act July 1, 1883, providing for the organization of corporations or societies for the purpose of furnishing life indemnity or pecuniary benefits to widows, orphans, etc., it was held that "a mutual benefit society is not a life insurance company in the restricted sense in which that term is used in our statute in relation to life insurance companies, nor is a certificate of membership in such society a policy of life insurance in the same restricted sense of the term, yet it is manifest that such membership certificate is in the nature of a mutual life insurance policy. . . . Such contracts are therefore subject to the rules of law governing life insurance policies, except so far as those rules must be held to be modified by the peculiar organization, objects, and policy of such societies." Martin v. Stubbings, 126 Ill. 387.

In Rockhold v. Canton Masonic Mut. Benev. Soc. 129 Ill. 440, 2 L. R. A. 420, it was said that what was said in Martin v. Stubbings, 126 Ill. 387, in reference to whether a certificate of membership in a mutual benevolent society is a policy of insurance, was predicated upon the statutes as affected by the amendatory act of the 28th of March, 1874. "In that case the society admitted its liability, and the only question was, whether it was to the assignee of the certificate or to the widow, and no question, therefore, was before the court as to the power of the corporation to issue the certificate in the first instance."

The court erred in rejecting the testimony to prove that on February 27, 1893, Schardt applied for and obtained a policy upon his life for $25,000 in the Mutual Life of New York, and that on March 9, 1893, he applied for and obtained a policy for a like amount in the United States Life of New York; and that in his written applications to these companies respectively in reply to questions requiring full disclosures of existing insurances upon his life, Schardt concealed insurances then upon his life, additional to those mentioned in his answers to said questions.

But other cases hold that mutual benefit companies are not subject to the general principles of insurance law, or to particular statutes applicable to insurance companies, where such association is not an insurance company, or where it is declared not to be an insurance company, or where it is expressly exempted by statute.

In Knudson v. Grand Council, N. W. L. of H. 7 S. D. 214, in an action on a certificate issued by a mutual benefit association where the defense was breach of warranty as to statements in regard to habits of intoxication, and it was insisted that Dak. Laws 1890, chap. 51, § 24, providing that in all suits on policies of life insurance that the company is estopped if its agent knew of such habits and the company thereafter received premiums, it was held that this section did not apply for the reason that § 51 provided that an association doing business by an assessment upon its members or upon the mutual premium plan should be deemed a mutual benefit association and not subject to the general insurance laws of this state regulating life insurance. It was further held that the first thirty-one sections treated of life insurance companies proper and the last twenty-three sections treated of assessment companies, and the application of the statute was also distinguished by the term "agent" as mutual associations generally act through lodges or councils. It was further held that a distinguishing feature was the term "policy" which only applies to life insurance companies, and in the statute relating to assessment companies the term "policy or certificates" was used. But the court quoted Comp. Laws, § 4164, providing that a breach of warranty "prevented the policy from attaching to the risk," and applied the term "policy" in that section to the certificates in controversy, and held that it was void.

And under Ill. Rev. Stat. 1874, p. 604, and act March 23, 1899, providing that before any life insur-

The court also erred in rejecting the offer of the company to prove that Schardt applied to the Royal Arcanum on May 4, 1891, and obtained a benefit certificate for $3,000 on his life, which was in force on December 2, 1892.

The evidence was competent and relevant because insurance in such orders was insurance within the meaning of the law and contract, and such insurance as Schardt was bound to disclose in his answer to the question, and the court should have so held.

What insurance companies generally considered material to the risk was simply their custom and practice in regard to such matters.

company goes into operation a guaranteed capital of at least $100,000 shall be required, and Rev. Stat. 1874, p. 201, chap. 22, § 31, providing that associations and societies which are intended to benefit the widows, orphans, heirs, or devisees of deceased members, and where no annual dues or premiums are required, and where the members shall receive no money as profit or otherwise, shall not be deemed insurance companies, the Commercial League Association issuing policies to its members was held to be an insurance company in the general and enlarged sense, but was not a life insurance company as that term was used in the act. It was further held that if it was an insurance company within the act of 1869, the amendment of 1874 has so changed the law that the company did not fall within the provisions of the act of 1869. And it was further held that a by-law providing that officers shall receive such compensation as may be agreed upon between them and the trustees was held not to be receiving money as profit or otherwise. It was said that compensation for labor could not be regarded as profit within the meaning of the law. Commercial League Assn. v. People, Needles, 90 Ill. 166. See Rockhold v. Canton Masonic Mut. Benev. Soc. 129 Ill. 440, 2 L. R. A. 420.

And where it was claimed that an association was a life insurance company within the meaning of Iowa Code, chap. 5, title 9, § 1161, providing that every company formed for the purpose of insuring the lives of individuals shall before issuing any policy comply with the conditions of this chapter, it was held that this section applied to stock and mutual companies, and that under § 1160 providing that nothing in this chapter shall prevent any number of persons from making mutual pledges to each other for their own insurance, but such association of persons shall in no case insure any life except that of its own members, nor shall the provisions of this chapter be applicable to such associations or companies; the Iowa Mutual Aid Association, affording financial aid and benefits to the families and beneficiaries of deceased members, and assistance to the members personally in case of disability, was not either a joint-stock company or mutual company and not controlled by § 1163 requiring a certain number of applications to be filed before they could do business. State, Auditor, v. Iowa Mut. Aid Assn. 59 Iowa, 125.

So, under Mass. Stat. 1887, chap. 204, authorizing the formation of associations for the purpose of rendering assistance to the widows, orphans, and dependents of deceased members, by means of the payment by each member of a fixed sum to be held by such association until the death of a member occurs, and then to be forthwith paid to the person or persons entitled thereto, and declaring that the provisions of the general laws relating to life insurance companies shall not be held to be applicable to such beneficiary corporations, a contract by The New England Mutual Aid Society with a member was held not to be assignable during his life to a person not within either of those classes, for if so these associations would stand substantially on the same footing as life insurance companies. Briggs v. Earl, 139 Mass. 473.

And the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association was not controlled by N. Y. Laws 1877, chap. 321, providing that no life insurance company can forfeit a policy for nonpayment of dues without having given the notice required, as by Laws 1883, chap. 175, § 5, co-operative or assessment plan companies are subject only to the provisions of the latter act. Ronald v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. 132 N. Y. 373, Affirming 32 N. Y. S. R. 981.

So, under Pa. act May 11, 1881, Pub. Laws, 20, providing that policies issued by life and fire insurance companies shall have attached copies of the by-laws and the same shall not be received in evidence unless so attached, a certificate in the Supreme Lodge Shield of Honor was held not to be an insurance policy within the meaning of this act. This was held on account of the distinction made in Pa. act May 1, 1876, Pub. Laws, 67, providing for the incorporation and regulation of insurance companies, and act June 5, 1883, Pub. Laws, 80, providing for the formation of corporations to assure lives on the assessment plan, which makes a distinction between insurance companies and beneficial associations. In this case the object of the association was to unite fraternally white male persons, between the ages of twenty-one and fifty years, who were sound physically and mentally and of good moral character, socially acceptable and believers in a Supreme Being, to give mutual and material aid to its members, and provide in the treasury a fund for the relief of sick and destitute members, and to provide by assessment a sum not less than $1,000 on proof of death of a member. There were no profits, no capital stock, and it was a secret society in which three black balls were sufficient to reject a member. Donlevy v. Supreme Lodge, S. of H. 1 Pa. Dist. R. 213.

And where the charter of the Grand Grove of the United Ancient Order of Druids of the state of Missouri provided that it was for the purpose of rendering aid and comfort to the members and families of members thereof, in case of accident, sickness, or death, and the property was to be used only for the purpose of creating a fund for aiding the sick and distressed and burying the dead, and for aiding the families of deceased, sick, or needy members of the order, and the last clause of § 1 of the charter provided that the powers hereby granted shall not

At common law whenever a party while in negotiation with another in respect to a business engagement in reply to a specific inquiry about a matter connected with the business states as true that which he either knows to be untrue, or which, from his peculiar relation to the fact, he is bound to know to be so, then, so far as knowledge of its falsity is a necessary element in the makeup of an actionable deceit or in the defense of a suit brought to enforce the contract, the scienter is established by proof of knowledge, or by showing the fact from which the knowledge is inferred.

VI. Where the question is not discussed.

In McClure v. Johnson, 58 Iowa, 620, where the question was as to the right of the insured to dispose of the insurance by will upon a certificate issued by the Free Masons, it was said "the contract was one of insurance."

In Expressmen's Aid Soc. v. Lewis, 9 Mo. App. 412, a certificate in a benefit association was treated as and called insurance without discussing that question.

In State v. Central St. Louis Masonic Hall Asso. 14 Mo. App. 597, it was held that in the absence of allegation or proof it would not be assumed that a Masonic institution was a charity.

In Mutual Acci. & Life Asso. v. Kayser, 14 W. N. C. 86, a company charging an admission fee and annual dues with weekly and death assessments was called and treated as a mutual insurance company incorporated under Pa. act April 29, 1874.

In Fisk v. Equitable Aid Union, 20 W. N. C. 290, a benefit certificate payable by assessment on members was treated as insurance without discussion.

In Illinois Masons' Benev. Soc. v. Winthrop, 85 Ill. 537, which was an action upon a certificate of membership in the Illinois Masons' Benevolent Society, and the certificate was in the nature of a policy of insurance on the life of P., issued in his lifetime, and the covenant was a promise to pay his widow after proof of death certain amounts for each member as regulated by their class, the court said: "The organization is a kind of mutual benefit association, managed by a directory, and the expenses and losses of the society are paid by assessments made upon the members for such purposes."

In Lawler v. Murphy, 58 Conn. 294, 8 L. R. A. 113, which was a suit against the president, secretary, and treasurer on an implied agreement to make the necessary assessment, the complaint alleged that they were jointly engaged in carrying on a life insurance business under the name of "Connecticut State Insurance Fund." The certificate was entitled "Connecticut State Insurance Fund of Ancient Order of Hibernians of the State of Connecticut," and provided that in consideration of $1 initiation fee and assessments levied from time to time, and the agreement to L. to accept the following conditions and rules as a part of the contract between the Ancient Order of Hibernians Insurance Fund, it constituted L. a benefit member and agreed to pay his wife if living, if not his heirs, a sum received from assessments not exceeding $1,000, and the conditions were that the statements in the application were part of the contract, and that the members should be in good standing in the order. The court does not discuss the question or treat it as an insurance company.

In a business transaction the presumption against a man making a fraudulent misstatement ceases—at least when they relate to his own past acts and conduct—at the moment it is shown that he has made the misstatement, and the presumption of fraud then arises which the law for sound reasons does not permit the guilty party to gainsay.

VII. Some definitions.

In Bolton v. Bolton, 73 Me. 290, it was said "the text-books, as well as the opinions of various courts, contain definitions of the contract of insurance as it applied to its various subjects; and although differently expressed they all concur as to its substantive elements, that all that is essential to such a contract is the payment of a consideration by one party, and the promise of the other to pay an agreed amount upon the happening of the contingency specified in the contract, it being understood that the former party had an insurable interest in the subject-matter insured."

It was held that the essential difference between a certificate of membership in a beneficial association and an ordinary life insurance policy, is that in the latter the rights of the beneficiaries are fixed by the terms of the policy, while in the former they depend upon the certificate and the rights of the members under the constitution and by-laws of the association. Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc. v. Burkhart, 110 Ind. 189; Grossman v. Supreme Lodge, K. & L. of H., 13 N. Y. S. R. 562; Nunrich v. Supreme Lodge, K. & L. of H., 24 N. Y. S. R. 287.

In Rockhold v. Canton Masonic Mut. Benev. Soc. 129 Ill. 440, it was said that a certificate promising to pay a member of the order on reaching a certain age a certain sum while living was one of insurance if considered apart from all arbitrary statutory classification or definitions. It is an undertaking by a society, in view of the ascertained age and condition of health of one of its members, in consideration of the present payment of a sum of money and of the undertaking to pay other contingent sums in the future by him, to pay a sum to him, or to his widow or heirs, . . . contingent as to time, upon the duration of his life; and it has been held that the undertaking is not the less a contract of insurance because the amount to be paid by the corporation is not a gross sum, but a sum graduated by the number of members holding similar contracts; nor because a portion of the premium is to be paid upon the uncertain periods of the deaths of such members; nor because, in case of nonpayment of assessments by members, the contract provides no means of enforcing payment thereof."

A certificate in the Supreme Council American Legion of Honor was held to be a contract of life insurance, "which is an agreement, in consideration of a specified sum in the aggregate or at stated 85 L. R. A.

intervals of time during the contract, to make a payment in money upon the destruction or injury of something in which the assured has an interest. Property is the subject-matter of fire and marine insurance. Life, health, and soundness of the person constitute usually the subject-matter of life and accident insurance." Supreme Council, A. L. of H. v. Larmour, 81 Tex. 71.

In State, Atty. Gen. v. Merchants' Exch. Mut. Benev. Soc. 72 Mo. 146, it was said that all insurance was originally based on the idea of benevolence, and, "if, then, defendants are exercising charity and benevolence by means of contracts for the payment of money upon the death of a member, they are doing an insurance business. It matters not how those contracts are evidenced, what name is given to them, whether evidenced by a certificate of membership, or the provisions of the articles of association, by by-laws, or by rules adopted by the society, courts will . . . look at the substance of the thing itself."

In Block v. Valley Mut. Ins. Co. 52 Ark. 201, it was said "the distinguishing feature [between insurance companies and benefit companies] is that they contemplate gain, while these contemplate benevolence only. Within the scope of their benevolence is included, with many fraternal objects, the providing of a fund to be paid upon the death of members, in which this is regarded as but an incident of the main object."

In Rensenhouse v. Seeley, 72 Mich. 603, it was said that mutual benefit and co-operative associations are, strictly speaking, insurance organizations, whenever in consideration of periodical contributions they engage to pay the member or his designated beneficiary a benefit upon the happening of a specified contingency, although they may also partake of the nature of fraternal societies, yet whether the benefit be paid for sickness or to accumulate a fund out of which payments are to be made to the beneficiaries of deceased members, the contract falls within the definition of an insurance contract, but they are excepted by statute from the provisions of the act applying to other insurance companies.

In Farmer v. State, 69 Tex. 561, it was held that a contract of the Masonic Mutual Benefit Association had all the features of a life insurance policy. "It is a contract by which one party for a consideration promises to make a certain payment of money upon the death of the other; and it is well settled that whatever may be the terms of pay-

Messrs. M. T. Bryan, E. H. East, and Vertrees & Vertrees for defendants in error.

Taft, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

There can be no doubt that this policy is to be construed according to the law of Pennsylvania. It is expressly provided in the application which is made part of the policy, that "the place of contract shall be the city of Philadelphia, state of Pennsylvania." In Wayman v. Southwirl, 28 U. S. 10 Wheat. 1-48, 6 L. ed. 253-264, Chief Justice Marshall stated it to be a principle of universal law that "in every forum a contract is governed by the law with a view to which it is made." See Pritchard v. Norton, 106 U. S. 124, 186, 27 L. ed. 104, 108, and cases there cited. In this case no necessity exists for presumption from the circumstances, because the intention of the parties is express.

An act of the legislature of Pennsylvania passed June 28, 1885, provides that "whenever the application for a policy of life insurance contains a clause of warranty of the truth of the answers therein contained, no misrepresentation or untrue statement in such application, made in good faith by the applicant, shall effect a forfeiture or be a ground of defense in any suit brought upon any policy of insurance issued upon the faith of such application unless such misrepresentation or untrue statement relate to some matter material to the risk." Laws 1885, p. 184, No. 101.

At common law it is held that the warranty of the truth of the answer to a specific inquiry in the application implies the agreement that the subject-matter of the question and answer is to be regarded as material, and that an untrue answer thus warranted avoids the policy, whether the answer be made in good faith or not. Anderson v. Fitzgerald, 4 H. L. Cas. 484. It is contended by counsel for the insurance ment of the consideration by the assured, or the mode of estimating or securing payment of the insurance money, it is still a contract of insurance, no matter by what name it may be called."

And in an action to determine whether a beneficial association was doing an insurance business in this state, it was said the law recognizes the existence of beneficial societies as distinguished from insurance companies. The general purpose of insurance companies is to afford indemnity against loss, and is not founded in any philanthropic, benevolent, or charitable principle, and indemnity against loss is a dominant feature of the contract of insurance; but in beneficial associations the underlying purpose is not to indemnify or to secure against loss; its design is to accumulate a fund from the contributions of its members "for beneficial or protective purposes," to be used in their own aid or relief, in the misfortunes of sickness, injury or death. The benefits, although secured by contract, and for that reason to a limited extent assimilated to the proceeds of insurance, are not so considered. Such societies are rather of a philanthropic or benevolent character; their beneficial features may be of a narrow or restricted character; the motives of the members may be to some extent selfish, but the principle upon which they rest is founded in the considerations mentioned." It was said that they have no capital stock, they yield no profit and their contracts exclude the idea of insurance or of indemnity or of security against loss. Com. v. Equitable Beneficial Assn. 137 Pa. 412.

company that the same mode of determining the materiality of representations must obtain under this statute. If so, then it is difficult to see what change the statute was intended to effect, because every matter warranted would be material, and the good faith in the statement would remain of as little importance as it did without the statute. This is one of a class of statutes passed in many states to relieve against the hardships arising from the strict enforcement at common law of warranties in insurance policies concerning matters having no real or proximate relation to the risk assumed by the insurer. By the aid of such warranties, and the innocent mistakes of the insured, it often happened that the insurer was able to escape liability on a ground having no real merit, and of the purest technicality. That such statutes are remedial in their nature, and quite within the police power of the legislature, is no longer a debatable question. White v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 4 Dill. 177; Equitable L. Assur. Soc. v. Pettus, 140 U. S. 226, 35 L. ed. 497; Wall v. Equitable L. Assur. Soc. 32 Fed. Rep. 273; Eagle Ins. Co. v. Ohio, Kinder, 53 U. As the statute was passed to prevent defeat of the policy by mere stringency of stipulation, a reasonable interpretation of it will not permit the mere fact of warranty in form to render every statement of fact material to the risk. Its manifest purpose was to leave open to judicial investigation in the ordinary way the question whether the fact concerning which inquiry was made, and an untrue answer given, was material to the risk. If it is in this manner found to be material, then the plain implication of the statute is that the usual penalty for breach of insurance condition and warranty shall follow, and the policy be avoided, whether the answer be made in good faith or not. If, however, the question truly answered relates to something not found to be material to the risk, and if the answer is in good faith, then the breach of warranty works no prejudice to the insured or his representatives. If, though the question truly relates to something not directly material to the risk, the untrue answer is made in bad faith,—that is with a knowledge of its falsity, and for the purpose of misleading the company into the contract,—the implication of the statute is that the rule at common law shall prevail, and the policy shall be avoided. The statute has been construed by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, and we think our conclusions above stated are in accordance with the views of that court. Hermany v. Fidelity Mut. L. Asso. 151 Pa. 17. In that case the court says (p. 23): "This act has effected a change in life insurance contracts,—a much-needed change so far as some companies are concerned. The questions of materiality and good faith are ordinarily questions of fact, and therefore for the jury. They were certainly so in this case. . . . The evident purpose of this legislation was to strike down, in this class of cases, literal warranties so far as they may be resorted to for the disreputable purpose of enforcing actually immaterial matters. It provides a rule of construction for the purpose of preventing injustice; and it is as much the duty of courts to enforce such rules as it is to administer the statute of frauds and perjuries."

The construction of a state statute by the highest court of the state is usually authoritative in courts of the United States. Burgess v. Seigman, 107 U. S. 20, 27 L. ed. 859. And even if it were otherwise, we should reach the same conclusion in this case. The court of appeals of Maryland has had occasion to construe this same statute, and has given it a like interpretation. Fidelity Mut. L. Asso. v. Picklin, 47 Md. 172, and 185.

Having settled the construction of the statute, we come now to the questions of evidence. The circuit court was right in holding that within the scope of the question, "Have you your life insured in this or any other company? (If so, give the name of each company and the kind and amount of the policy)," were not included Schardt's certificates of insurance in the Knights of Pythias and Royal Arcanum Mutual Aid Associations. It will be conceded that these associations, which are primarily for social and charitable purposes, and for securing efficient mutual aid among their members, are not usually described as insurance companies. That the certificate which they issue to a member, insuring upon certain conditions the payment of a sum certain to the member's representatives on his death, has much resemblance in form, purpose, and effect to an insurance policy, is true; and, if we were called upon to give the application a wide and liberal construction in favor of the insurance company, we might properly hold that the question embraced in its scope every association or individual contracting to pay money to one's representatives in the event of his death. Such a construction might be warranted by the probable purpose of the question to enable the company to judge how great a motive his life insurance would furnish the applicant for self-destruction, or the fraudulent simulation of death. But we are here considering a contract and application drawn with great nicety by the insurance company and framed with the sole purpose of eliciting from the insured full information of all the circumstances which the company's long experience has led it to believe to be valuable in calculating the risk. We cannot presume the company to have been ignorant of the fact that large numbers of persons have taken out life insurance in mutual benefit associations which are not ordinarily described as insurance companies, and that doubt has often arisen whether the contracts they issue are properly or technically described as life insurance at all. Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Chamberlain, 182 U. S. 304, 33 L. ed. 341. Having in view the well-established rule that insurance contracts are to be construed against those who frame them (Manufacturers' Acci. Indemnity Co. v. Dorgan, 16 U. S. App. 290, 809, 7 C. C. A. 581, 58 Fed. Rep. 945, 22 L. R. A. 620; Accident Ins. Co. v. Orandal, 120 U. S. 527, 583, 30 L. ed. 740, 743), and that any doubt or ambiguity in them is to be resolved in favor of the insured, we conclude that a certificate in a mutual benefit and social society was not within the description, "policy of life insurance in any other company." We are fortified in the conclusion by the fact that this contract is a Pennsylvania contract, and the courts of that state have uniformly held that mutual aid associations and insurance companies are so clearly to be distinguished that statutes applying to insurance companies and their policies do not have application to mutual aid associations, and the certificates of life insurance which they issue to their members. In Dickinson v. Ancient Order of U. W., 159 Pa. 253, the defendant association sought to avoid its certificate on the ground of misrepresentation in the application. The plaintiff objected to the introduction of the application because it had not been attached to the policy in accordance with the Pennsylvania statute which forbade the introduction by an insurance company, in defense of a suit on its contract of insurance, of an application not attached to the policy when issued. It was held that the statute did not apply, because the defendant association was not an insurance company, but belonged to the distinctly recognized class of organizations known as "benevolent associations." See also Northwestern Masonic Aid Assn. v. Jones, 154 Pa. 99; Com. v. Equitable Beneficial Assn., 137 Pa. 412; Com. v. National Mut. Aid Assn., 94 Pa. 481; *Lithgow v. Supreme Tent. It is true that in other states it has been held that such associations are within the description of "insurance companies," and that the contracts they make are properly termed "policies," as that term is used in the statutes of such states. State, Graham, v. Nichols, 78 Iowa, 747; Co-operative Fire Insurance Order v. Lewis, 12 Lea, 136; Presbyterian Mut. Assur. Fund v. Allen, 106 Ind. 594; Com. v. Wetherbee, 105 Mass. 159; *Sherman v. 102. In this conflict of authority, we must lean towards the decisions of the state courts of that state, according to the laws of which we must construe this contract, and, for the reasons already given, hold that certificates of membership in mutual benefit benevolent associations were not embraced in the question asked by the company in that state.

We now come to the questions of evidence with respect to the $5,000 policy in the New York Life Insurance Company which Schardt omitted in his answer to the question concerning other insurances. It is first insisted for the plaintiff below that his answer was not untrue. He was asked if he had other policies in other companies, and, if so, to state the companies and amount. It is urged that when he gave three such policies the question was answered correctly, and that his failure to give the fourth policy did not involve a false statement, but only left the answer incomplete, but true in everything stated. Several cases are cited to the point that such an answer is not a misrepresentation. In Perrine v. Marine & General Travelers' Ins. Soc. 2 El. & El. 817, the applicant was asked what was his profession, and he answered that he was an "esquire." In fact, he was an ironmonger. It was held that there was no misrepresentation here, but, at the most, only a concealment or falsehood by implication, that the answer was true as far as it went. The same ruling was made by the court of appeals of New York in Dilleber v. Home L. Ins. Co., 69 N. Y. 256, 25 Am. Rep. 182. There the applicant was asked to state the physicians he had consulted in the last ten years. He answered that he had consulted Dr. Paioe nine years before. In fact, he had also consulted another physician. It was held that, the answer being true as far as it went, there was no breach of the warranty; that the answer was full and true. We do not think that these cases can be supported. In Phanir Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Raddin, 120 U. S. 183, 30 L. ed. 644, the supreme court held that, where the answers to questions were obviously incomplete, the insurance company, by failing to inquire further before issuing the policy, waived any right to complain of such incompleteness; but the court clearly indicated its view that if such an answer was apparently complete, but in fact was otherwise, it was a false answer, and a breach of the warranty of its full truth. Towne v. Fitchburg Mut. F. Ins. Co., 7 Allen, 52, 53; London Assurance v. Mansel, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 863; Bliss, Ins., 2d ed. 189, 190; Phillips, Ins., §§ 550, 565, 567. The answer to such a question contains the necessary implication that there is no other insurance than that stated, and, if there is other insurance, it is as false as if the existence of other insurance were expressly denied. As already stated, any answer to a question, though concerning a matter not material to the risk, if made with intent to deceive the insurance company, would avoid the policy. Hence, even assuming that the question of other insurance was found by the jury to be not material to the risk, the company still had a complete defense if it could show that the answer had been made in bad faith. The intent of Schardt in omitting the New York Life policy, therefore, became a substantial issue, and evidence relevant to show his intent should have been admitted. The company offered to prove that in answers to similar questions in application for other policies, he had made answers equally untrue. We think this evidence was relevant and competent. It might have been forcibly argued on behalf of the defendant that Schardt had a motive to suppress the amount of other insurance, in fear that, if the defendant knew all his then insurance, it would prompt inquiry into his purpose in carrying insurance in an amount out of proportion to his regular income of $1,500, upon which he was obliged to support a family, and would lead to a rejection of his application. And if the defendant could show a similar suppression of the same fact in the two applications for the later policies for $25,000 each, made within three months thereafter, when the same motive may be supposed to have been present, it would properly strengthen the argument that his suppression of the extent of his insurance in this case was with intent to conceal and deceive. Such evidence would have a tendency to show that his omission in the three cases was not by accident, but by design. It is a well-established rule of evidence that, where the issue is the fraud or innocence of one in doing an act having the effect to mislead another, it is relevant to show other similar acts of the same person having the same effect to mislead, at or about the same time, or connected with the same general subject matter. The legal relevancy of such evidence is based on logical principles. It certainly diminishes the possibility that an innocent mistake was made in an untrue and misleading statement, to show similar but different misleading statements of the same person about the same matter, because it is less probable that one would make innocent mistakes of a false and misleading character in repeated instances than in one instance. Thus, where one was on trial for selling skimmed milk for fresh milk, in violation of the statute, it was held competent to show other instances of similar sales on other days by the accused about the same time, because, if he sold skimmed milk in repeated instances, it was rendered more probable that he knew its character in each instance. He might have made the mistake once, but not frequently. Bainbridge v. State, 80 Ohio St. 264. So, in this court, where the question was of the defendant's motive and knowledge in making statements concerning the character of a silver mine, we held it competent to show an elaborate and fraudulent scheme to mislead, not the plaintiffs but another, into the purchase of the mine, although the scheme was concocted and carried into attempted execution at least two years before the statements and sale to the plaintiffs. It was the circumstances that the acts related to the sale of the same mine, and that the motive for its sale might be presumed to continue, that removed the objection based on remoteness in point of time. Mudsill Min. Co. v. Watrous, 22 U. S. App. 12, 9 C. C. A. 415, 61 Fed. Rep. 163. Judge Lurton, in delivering the opinion of the court in that case, said: "It is not in such a case essential that these former acts of fraud were not contemporaneous with the transaction under inquiry. If they were frauds of like character, and especially if they concerned former efforts to sell the same property, they are admissible. Remoteness in point of time may weaken their evidential value, but will not ordinarily justify exclusion."

Judge Lurton cites in support of this view Ross v. Miner, 67 Mich. 410; Hoxie v. Home Ins. Co. 82 Conn. 21, 85 Am. Dec. 240; Rafferty v. State, 91 Tenn. 655; Bottomley v. United States, 1 Story, 136; Jordan v. Osgood, 109 Mass. 461, 12 Am. Rep. 731; Castle v. Bulard, 64 U. S. 23 How. 174, 16 L. ed. 424; Butler v. Watkins, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 457, 20 L. ed. 629; Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 598, 29 L. ed. 999; Blake v. Albion L. Assur. Soc. L. R. 4 C. P. Div. 94.

It would seem clear from the foregoing that the objection made by counsel for the plaintiff that the other false statements of other insurance were too remote in point of time is not tenable. But it is suggested that the fact that the instances sought to be proved were subsequent to the insurance in issue destroys their relevancy, because the fraudulent intent present in them might have been formed after an innocent mistake. This possibility, of course, affects the probative force of these subsequent instances to show fraud, but we do not think it makes them inadmissible. In Wood v. United States, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 342, 10 L. ed. 987, the question was whether there had been fraud in invoicing importations under the customs revenue law. It was objected that, while similar undervaluations in other importations prior to the one in issue might be admissible, still it was error to admit such undervaluations in later importations. To this, Mr. Justice Story, speaking for the court, said: "The other objection has as little foundation, for fraud in the first importation may be as fairly deducible from other subsequent fraudulent importations by the same party as fraud would be in the last importation from prior fraudulent importations. In each case the quo animo is in question, and the presumption of fraudulent intention may equally arise and equally prevail."

For the error in excluding evidence of false statements concerning other insurance in the subsequent policies, the judgment herein must be reversed. The case will doubtless be tried again, however; and it becomes our duty, therefore, to examine and decide other questions made upon this record by the defendant, which must, of necessity, arise again on the second trial.

At the trial the defendant introduced witnesses who had been long engaged in the life insurance business, and was permitted by the court to ask them whether the facts concerning which it was either admitted or claimed that Schardt had made untrue statements, and the fact of his embezzlements which he did not disclose, were material to the risk; but the court declined to permit an answer to the question whether, by the usage and practice of all insurance companies, such facts were regarded as material. This latter ruling of the court was excepted to by the defendant company. The question of evidence thus presented has been before the courts of England and America in many different phases, and the decisions present a bewildering conflict of authority. In the leading case of Carter v. Boehm,

8 Burr. 1905, the question arose what effect, if any, was to be given to the opinion of a broker that certain statements in a letter within the knowledge of the insured should have been communicated to the insurer, and that if they had been the insurer would not have "meddled" with the insurance. The subject of insurance was a so called fort and warehouse in the island of Sumatra, and the danger insured against was capture by the enemy. The facts stated in the letter, not communicated, were a report of an abandoned plan of the French in the previous year to attack the place, and the surmise of the writer that a similar plan might be carried out during the then current year. Lord Mansfield said of the evidence: "But we all think the jury ought not to pay the least regard to it. It is mere opinion, which is not evidence. It is opinion after an event. It is opinion without the least foundation from any previous precedent or usage. It is an opinion which, if rightly formed, could only be drawn from the same premises from which the court and jury were to determine the cause, and therefore it is improper and irrelevant in the mouth of a witness."

Prior to this, in 1740, Chief Justice Lee, of the common pleas, had admitted as evidence the opinion of insurance brokers that contents of a letter concerning a ship should have been disclosed. Seaman v. Fonereau, 2 Strange, 1183. Lord Kenyon (Lord Mansfield's successor) held that commercial men might testify that, had a fact been known concerning the voyage of a ship, it would have made a difference of 15 per cent in the premium, and that many underwriters would not have taken the risk on any terms, and expressed the opinion that such evidence was good evidence, admissible upon the same ground that the evidence of persons versed in arts and science was admitted on questions involving them. Chaurand v. Angerstein, Peake, 45. In Haywood v. Rodgers, 4 East, 500, before Lord Ellenborough, evidence of insurance brokers as to the effect of certain facts upon insurance premiums was admitted without objection, but it was not given any weight by the court. In Littledale v. Dixon, 1 Bos. & P. N. R. 152, the common pleas court considered evidence (admitted, so far as appears, without objection) that the knowledge of the arrival of two ships before the one insured would not vary the premium actually demanded. In Berthon v. Loughman, 2 Starkie, 258, Mr. Justice Holroyd, of the Queen's bench, held that, upon the question of the materiality of a fact, it was competent to ask an insurance broker what effect its disclosure would have among underwriters generally to increase the premium, but not what the witness would do in a particular case. In the preceding year Chief Justice Gibbs held that a rumor, if material, ought to be communicated, but held that the opinion of underwriters as to whether the rumor, or any other fact, was material, was inadmissible, stating that Lord Mansfield and Lord Kenyon had discountenanced this kind of evidence. Durrell v. Bederley, Holt, N. P. 286. With respect to Lord Kenyon, as we have seen, he was hardly accurate. In Richards v. Murdock, 10 Barn. & C. 527, Lord Tenterden, of the Queen's bench, was in accord with his colleague, Mr. 88 L. R. A.

Justice Holroyd, and held that underwriters might testify that a fact not disclosed was material; and his ruling was not disturbed by the full court. In Elton v. Larkins, 5 Car. & P. 392, before Tindal, Ch. J., evidence of underwriters was admitted to the point that the time of the vessel's sailing was material, and that, had it been known, the policy would not have been issued. In this case, Sergeant Wilde in argument stated that such evidence, in spite of Lord Mansfield's objection, seemed to have crept into competency. In Chapman v. Walton, 10 Bing. 57, a case heard by the court of common pleas in banc, the question was somewhat different. It was on an issue whether an underwriter had been derelict in altering insurance under instructions. The evidence of underwriters was held competent upon the point of what a reasonably skilful and prudent underwriter would have done. In admitting the evidence, however, Chief Justice Tindal, of the common pleas, relied on Justice Holroyd's decision in Berthon v. Loughman, and expressly dissented from the view of his predecessor, Chief Justice Gibbs, in Durrell v. Bederley. In Quin v. National Assurance Co. 1 Jones & C. 816, the Irish exchequer chamber followed Richards v. Murdock and Berthon v. Loughman, and admitted evidence of the secretary of the insurance company that knowledge by his company of an undisclosed fact would have raised the rate of insurance premium it would have demanded. In Campbell v. Richards, 5 Barn. & Ad. 840, precisely the same question came before the court of Queen's bench in banc which had been before that court in Richards v. Murdock. The decision in the latter case was overruled, and it was held that the evidence of underwriters upon the materiality of the undisclosed fact was not competent. The case is put on the authority of Lord Mansfield and Chief Justice Gibbs, and the then recent decision of the common pleas in Chapman v. Walton is not referred to. This is the last English case where the question has been raised and discussed. In Ionides v. Pender, L. R. 9 Q. B. 531, evidence of underwriters that overvaluation of the cargo was a material fact to be known, that in such a case the risk was considered speculative, and that some underwriters could not take such risks, and others would take them only at an advance in the premium of from 25 to 30 per cent, was admitted without objection, and seems to have formed one of the chief grounds for the judgment of the court, delivered by Mr. Justice Blackburn. It may fairly be said, from this review of the English cases, that the question is an open one. See Carter v. Boehm, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 9th Am. ed. 791. Even in those cases where evidence of underwriters has been admitted, no distinction has been recognized, except, possibly, by Mr. Justice Holroyd in Berthon v. Loughman, 2 Starkie, 258, between the individual opinions of such witnesses as to the materiality of undisclosed or misrepresented facts, and their statements, based on usage, of the effect which a knowledge of such facts would have among underwriters generally, in open market, so to speak, upon insurance premiums.

In this country, though all the cases are not easily reconciled, it is not so difficult as in England to reach a satisfactory result. At first, in marine cases, it was generally held that underwriters might be asked the direct question whether the facts undisclosed were material to the risk. Mr. Justice Washington permitted it in two cases: Moses v. Delaware Ins. Co. 1 Wash. C. C. 386; Marshall v. Union Ins. Co. 2 Wash. C. C. 357. In M'Lanahan v. Universal Ins. Co. 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 170, 7 L. ed. 98, the question was whether the time of sailing was material to the risk, as a matter of law; and, in pointing out why it was a question for the jury, Mr. Justice Story said: "The material ingredients of all such inquiries are mixed up with nautical skill, information, and experience, and are to be ascertained, in part, upon the testimony of maritime persons, and are in no sense judicially cognizable as matter of law. The ultimate fact itself, which is the test of materiality,—that is, whether the risk be increased so as to enhance the premium,—is, in many cases, an inquiry dependent upon the judgment of underwriters and others, who are conversant with the subject of insurance."

In Hawes v. New England Mut. Marine Ins. Co. 2 Curt. C. C. 229, the issue was whether the failure to disclose that a vessel was aground was a material fact, and an underwriter was called to give evidence. Mr. Justice Curtis said: "I do not allow you to ask the witness what he himself, as an underwriter, would have done; but whether, from his knowledge of the business he is able to state that the facts in question would or would not have an influence with underwriters generally, in determining the amount of the premium. . . . Here the inquiry is, in substance, whether the market price of insurance is affected by particular facts. If the witness, being conversant with the business, has gained, in the course of his employment, a knowledge of the practical effect of these facts, or similar facts, upon premiums, he may inform the jury what it is."

The question soon arose in fire insurance cases. In Merriam v. Middlesex Mut. F. Ins. Co. 21 Pick. 162, 32 Am. Dec. 252, where the issue was whether a condition of the policy that no alteration while the policy was current should be made in the building insured, which would increase the risk of fire, was violated, the court held that the alteration must have been such that a higher rate of premium would have been demanded for insurance of the building in its altered form than before. With this as a test of materiality, which, as we have seen, was approved by Mr. Justice Story in M'Lanahan v. Universal Ins. Co. 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 170, 7 L. ed. 98, the same court, in the subsequent cases, has established a distinction, to be enforced in the use of insurance expert evidence on such an issue, which was hinted at by Mr. Justice Holroyd in Berthon v. Loughman, 3 Starkie, 258, and by Mr. Justice Curtis in Hawes v. New England Mut. Marine Ins. Co. 2 Curt. C. C. 229. It is clearly stated by Mr. Justice Gray in Luce v. Dorchester Mut. F. Ins. Co. 105 Mass. 297, 7 Am. Rep. 522. There the issue was whether risk of fire was increased by leaving a house unoccupied. Following decisions of the same court in Multry v. Mohawk Valley Ins. Co. 5 Gray, 541, 66 Am. Dec. 380, and Lyman v. State Mut. F. Ins. Co. 14 Allen, 329, the court held that insurance experts could not testify that it did increase the risk, because it was only a matter of common knowledge. The learned justice continued, however, as follows: "But whether such a change in the occupation is material to the risk might also be tested by the question whether underwriters generally would charge a higher premium. Merriam v. Middlesex Mut. F. Ins. Co. 21 Pick. 162, 32 Am. Dec. 252. That being a matter within the peculiar knowledge of persons versed in the business of insurance, testimony of such persons upon that point is admissible."

Cited in support of this are the remarks of Mr. Justice Story and of Mr. Justice Curtis above quoted. The distinction stated in Luce v. Dorchester Mut. F. Ins. Co. has been approved by the same court in the late case of First Cong. Church v. Holyoke Mut. F. Ins. Co. 158 Mass. 475, 19 L. R. A. 587, and has been recognized by courts of other states. Plumbers' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Rowland, 66 Md. 236, 244; Franklin F. Ins. Co. v. Gruter, 100 Pa. 266. Such a distinction would also seem to be the basis of the ruling in Martin v. Franklin F. Ins. Co. 42 N. J. L. 46. In the later New York fire insurance cases, though they are hardly to be reconciled with Jefferson Ins. Co. v. Colwell, 7 Wend. 72, 22 Am. Dec. 567, it seems to be ruled that insurance experts may be asked directly whether the fact in question would increase the risk. Hobby v. Duna, 17 Barb. 111; Cornish v. Farm Buildings F. Ins. Co. 74 N. Y. 297; Leitch v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co. 66 N. Y. 102. Reliance is had by the New York courts upon the opinion of Chancellor Kent, expressed in his Commentaries (vol. 3, p. 285), that such evidence is admissible. The same ruling is made in Kern v. South St. Louis Mut. Ins. Co. 40 Mo. 19, and in Mitchell v. Home Ins. Co. 32 Iowa, 424, and Russell v. Cedar Rapids Ins. Co. 78 Iowa, 216, 4 L. R. A. 588. In Schenck v. Mercer County Mut. F. Ins. Co. 24 N. J. L. 451, it was held proper to ask a fireman of ten years' experience whether the putting of the third story to an L increased the risk. In Brink v. Merchants' & M. Ins. Co. 49 Vt. 442, it was held that the owner of a sawmill, who had altered it, might testify that in his opinion the alteration did not increase the risk of fire. And in Daniels v. Hudson River F. Ins. Co. 12 Cush. 416, 59 Am. Dec. 192, an insurance expert was allowed to state that the erection of a partition did not increase the risk; but this is not to be harmonized with the later Massachusetts cases. The great weight of authority in this country, however, is against the view that an insurance expert may be asked his own opinion whether the undisclosed or misrepresented facts were material to the risk. In addition to the Massachusetts cases above cited, there is a most satisfactory discussion of the subject in Hartford Protection Ins. Co. v. Harmer, 2 Ohio St. 455, 59 Am. Dec. 684, and in Hill v. Lafayette Ins. Co. 2 Mich. 481. Other cases to the same effect are Schmidt v. Peoria M. & F. Ins. Co. 41 Ill. 295; Joyce v. Maine Ins. Co. 45 Me. 169, 71 Am. Dec. 536; Cannell v. Phœnix Ins. Co. 59 Me. 582; Thayer v. Providences Washington Ins. Co. 70 Me. 539; Kirby v. Phœnix Ins. Co. 9 Lea. 142. In State v. Watson, 65 Me. 74, the issue was, in a prosecution for arson, whether it could be expected that fire from one building would be communicated to another building, some distance away from the first. It was held improper to admit evidence of insurance experts on this question. And a similar ruling was made by the Supreme Court of the United States in Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 472, 24 L. ed. 258,—an action for damages for burning a warehouse by locomotive sparks. The issue was whether the communication of fire from a pile of lumber to the warehouse and other buildings might have been reasonably anticipated, and insurance experts were called. Their evidence was held inadmissible; and Mr. Justice Strong, in delivering the opinion of the court, cites the language of Lord Mansfield in Carter v. Boehm, of Chief Justice Gibbs in Durrell v. Bederley, and of Lord Denman in Campbell v. Rickards, in support of this conclusion. It is in accord with the better reason, also, to exclude opinions of insurance experts upon the point whether an undisclosed fact was material to an insurance risk. If it requires scientific knowledge or peculiar skill to trace the possible causal or evidential connection between the fact claimed to be material and the loss or death insured against, then, of course, the testimony of those learned in the necessary science, or trained in the particular craft, should be furnished to the jury, to enable them properly to estimate the weight which a reasonably prudent insurer would naturally give to the fact, in his calculation of chances. But where the calculation of the chances involves a consideration only of facts of every-day life, of the motives of men living in the same community with members of the jury, and of those ordinary physical and natural causes of which every man is presumed to have an understanding, it is difficult to see why an insurance examiner should be permitted to influence the jury by giving his sworn opinion on the very issue which they are assembled to try, and of which they are presumed to have the same opportunities upon which to found a reliable judgment as he. It is true, he may have had occasion, in his business, to consider and weigh facts of this character, for this purpose, much more frequently than the jury, but that does not render his opinions on the facts competent evidence. It is the business of judges and lawyers to consider and estimate the value of evidence, and for their own use they doubtless formulate in their minds certain rules for weighing and sifting facts and motives, and by such practice may have acquired great skill in divining the truth; but no one would say that their judgment of the facts of a case could be given in evidence before a jury to assist the jury in its deliberations.

The better authorities, however, seem to sustain the rule that the insurance experts may testify concerning the usage of insurance companies generally in charging higher rates of premium or in rejecting risks, when made aware of the fact claimed to be material. The distinction between this and the rule just discussed may seem at first a close one, but on consideration it appears to be sound. It may be asked why, if one insurance man of long experience cannot give his individual opinion that a fact is or is not material to a risk, should it be competent for him to state the opinions of a great many insurance men on the same question? A fact is material to an insurance risk when it naturally and substantially increases the probability of that event upon which the policy is to become payable. Materiality of a fact, in insurance law, is subjective. It concerns rather the impression which the fact claimed to be material would reasonably and naturally convey to the insurer's mind before the event, and at the time the insurance is effected, than the subsequent actual causal connection between the fact, or the probable cause it evidences, and the event. Thus, it is by no means conclusive upon the question of the materiality of a fact that it was actually one link in a chain of causes leading to the event. Watson v. Mainwaring, 4 Taunt. 763; Jones v. Provincial Ins. Co. 3 C. B. N. S. 65; Ross v. Insurance Co. 2 Ir. Jur. 206; World Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schultz, 78 Ill. 586. And, on the other hand, it does not prove a fact to have been immaterial to the risk that it had no actual subsequent relation to the manner in which the event insured against did occur. A fair test of the materiality of a fact is found, therefore, in the answer to the question whether reasonably careful and intelligent men would have regarded the fact, communicated at the time of affecting the insurance, as substantially increasing the chances of the loss insured against. The best evidence of this is to be found in the usage and practice of insurance companies in regard to raising the rates or in rejecting the risk on becoming aware of the fact. If the rates are not raised in such a case, it may be inferred that reasonably careful men do not regard the fact as material. If the rates are raised, or the risk is rejected, then they would have done so.

The question still remains whether the rules above stated are applicable to life insurance cases. Certainly, there is the same ground for excluding the individual opinions of insurance men upon the materiality of particular facts as in marine and fire insurance. Of course, the evidence of physicians as to the tendency of diseases and bodily conditions or habits to shorten life is competent, but insurance men are not expert upon these subjects. Facts other than those relating to the health and habits of the applicant usually either relate to the motive of the applicant to destroy himself, or increase the probability of death by exposure to bodily injury. Of the materiality of this class of facts the jury can judge quite as well as one experienced in passing on insurance risks. They are within the common knowledge of mankind. The evidence of the insurance experts that certain facts were material to the risk was therefore incompetent.

The question of the competency of the evidence of insurance experts as to the usage of life insurance companies generally to raise premiums or reject risks when made aware of an undisclosed or misrepresented fact is more uncertain. In Rauls v. American Mut. L. Ins. Co. 27 N. Y. 257, 290, 84 Am. Dec. 280, the defendants made a general offer to prove by experts in the business of life insurance that a person who was in the habitual use, to excess, of intoxicating drinks, would not be considered an insurable subject. The court said: "This was rightly excluded. It was entirely immaterial what description of subject persons or companies engaged in the business of life insurance would consider good or bad risks. The inquiry did not relate to matters of science or skill, but called, in effect, for the opinion of witnesses as to what persons engaged in a particular business would consider prudent to do in certain cases."

The case was followed in Higbie v. Guardian Mut. L. Ins. Co. 58 N. Y. 608, and the same ruling was made in a life insurance case in West Virginia. Schwanbach v. Ohio Valley Protective Union, 25 W. Va. 629, 652, 52 Am. Rep. 227.

It is very difficult to reconcile the decision in Ravels v. American Mut. L. Ins. Co. with the subsequent fire insurance cases, already referred to, of Cornish v. Farm Buildings Fire Ins. Co. 74 N. Y. 297, and Litch v. Atlantic Mut. L. Ins. Co. 86 N. Y. 102. It will not do to distinguish them on the ground that the one relates to life insurance, and the others to fire insurance, because the case upon which the court relies in Ravels' Case is Joyce v. Maine Ins. Co. 45 Me. 168, 71 Am. Dec. 536,—a fire insurance case. After a full consideration, we can see no reason why, in this regard, the rule in life insurance cases should be different from that in fire insurance cases. Our conclusion is in accordance with a decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, delivered by Chief Justice Black, in Hartman v. Keystone Ins. Co. 21 Pa. 466. In that case an applicant had stated that he was a farmer, when in fact he was a railroad man and a slave catcher. One familiar with the insurance business, it was held, might testify that in his own and all other companies a high rate of premium was charged for a railroad man, and that no insurance would be issued upon the life of a slave catcher, whose occupation was considered extra hazardous. The case is cited in First Cong. Church v. Holyoke Mut. F. Ins. Co. 158 Mass. 475, 19 L. R. A. 587, as supporting the distinction formulated by Justice Gray in Luce v. Dorchester Mut. F. Ins. Co. 105 Mass. 297, 7 Am. Rep. 522, and we think it may be so treated. Of course such evidence as this is only to aid the jury, and will not be conclusive upon them; but, according to the best considered authorities, it is admissible. If the fact, the materiality of which is in question, is one of a class of facts which life insurance companies are frequently required to consider in relation to the acceptance of risks, so that a witness may base an answer on a well-defined practice of insurance companies, we think such an answer competent. But care must be taken that the witness shall not substitute his own opinion, or that of his own company only, neither of which is relevant, for the usage of companies generally. The modern practice of life insurance companies seems to be, not to vary the premium, except for age, and either to accept risks of the same age, or reject them altogether. If so, there would seem to be no means of judging the materiality of any other fact than that of age, from the usage or practice of insurance companies, except by their acceptance or rejection of the risk; and the question should be limited, in such cases, therefore, to whether insurance companies generally, if made aware of the undisclosed fact, would reject the risk. The question which the court refused to permit was whether the misrepresented or concealed fact would be regarded among insurance companies generally as material. This was rightly rejected. The proper form in which the question might have been put to a duly qualified witness was: "Are you able to say, from your knowledge of the practice and usage among life insurance companies generally, that information of this fact would have enhanced the premium to be charged, or would have led to a rejection of the risk?"

It was clearly right in the trial court to refuse to direct the jury to return a verdict for the defendant on the ground that the $5,000 policy in the New York Life Insurance Company on Schardt's life was a fact material to the risk, as matter of law. Where the parties have not, by the terms of the application and policy, impliedly stipulated that each subject inquired about shall be material, the question whether a fact is material to the risk is always a question for the jury. Now, but for the statute of Pennsylvania already considered, the provisions of the policy here in suit would certainly render the answer to each question of the application material, with all the consequences thereby imposed by the law of insurance; but, as already stated, it was the chief purpose of the statute to destroy such conventional materiality, and to open to judicial investigation the question on its merits. Much reliance is placed by counsel for plaintiff in error on the language of Mr. Justice Gray in Phenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Raddin, 120 U. S. 188, 189, 30 L. ed. 644, 646, where, in delivering the opinion of the court, he said: "Whether there is other insurance on the same subject, and whether such insurance has been applied for and refused, are material facts, at least when statements regarding them are required by the insurers as part of the basis of the contract."

In support of this are cited the following cases: Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 495, 10 L. ed. 1044; Jeffries v. Economical Mut. Ins. Co. 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 47, 22 L. ed. 833; Anderson v. Fitzgerald, 4 H. L. Cas. 484; Macdonald v. Lloyds Union F. & Life Ins. Co. L. R. 9 Q. B. 328; Edington v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 77 N. Y. 564, 100 N. Y. 536. In each one of these cases it will be found that by the terms of the policy the application and its answers were made the basis of the contract, and the question and answer concerning other insurance gave that fact a contractual materiality. The same thing is true of the other cases cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error: Bowditch Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Winslow, 8 Gray, 481; Ryan v. Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. 46 Wis. 674; Byers v. Farmers' Ins. Co. 85 Ohio St. 614, 85 Am. Rep. 623; Cooper v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 50 Pa. 299, 88 Am. Dec. 544; Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Small, 30 U. S. App. 127, 14 C. C. A. 38, 66 Fed. Rep. 494; Bord v. Penn Mut. F. Ins. Co. 153 Pa. 261; Mitchell v. Lycoming Mut. Ins. Co. 51 Pa. 402; Obermayer v. Globe Mut. Ins. Co. 43 Mo. 576; Hutchinson v. Western Ins. Co. 21 Mo. 101, 64 Am. Dec. 218. In London Assurance v. Mansel, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 370, cited for plaintiff in error, the action was in equity to set aside a policy; and, of course, it became a question for the court to decide whether that which had been concealed was material. But the court in that case intimated that it would have been a question of fact for the jury, in an action at law, had the parties not foreclosed the inquiry by an implied stipulation that it should be material. In Columbian Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 49, 7 L. ed. 844, the concealed or misrepresented fact related to the interest of the assured in the subject of insurance, and Chief Justice Marshall points out with much clearness and force why it might, and would naturally, be quite material to the risk; but an examination of Mr. Justice Story's opinion in the same case when it was again before the court shows that the remarks of the chief justice were not intended to settle the materiality, as matter of law, for on the second hearing the court expressly decided that the question was one of fact for the jury. See Columbia Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 516, 517, 9 L. ed. 516, 517. The circuit court of appeals of the third circuit has had occasion quite recently to consider when the materiality of a fact is for the jury, and, in a clearly stated opinion, Judge Wales shows that it is always for the jury, unless the answers in the application are expressly made the basis of the contract. Fidelity & C. Co. v. Alpert, 28 U. S. App. 398, 14 C. C. A. 474, 67 Fed. Rep. 460. In Maryland Ins. Co. v. Ruden, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 339, 8 L. ed. 242, Chief Justice Marshall said: "It is well settled that the operation of any concealment on the policy depends on its materiality to the risk, and this court has decided that this materiality is a subject for the consideration of a jury."

Other cases to the same effect are Garcelon v. Hampden F. Ins. Co. 50 Me. 580; Mutual F. Ins. Co. v. Deale, 18 Md. 26; Keeler v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 16 Wis. 528, 84 Am. Dec. 714; Farmers' Ins. & Loan Co. v. Snyder, 16 Wend. 481, 30 Am. Dec. 118; Daniels v. Hudson River F. Ins. Co. 12 Cush. 416, 59 Am. Dec. 192; Franklin F. Ins. Co. v. Coates, 14 Md. 285; Howard F. Ins. Co. v. Chase, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 509, 18 L. ed. 524. The remark in the opinion of this court in Provident Sav. L. Assur. Soc. v. Llewellyn, 16 U. S. App. 405, 7 C. C. A. 579, 58 Fed. Rep. 940, from which it might be inferred that the question of the materiality of the insured having had delirium tremens is a matter of law for the court, in any case where inquiry is not foreclosed by express or implied stipulation, was unnecessary to the decision of that case, and cannot be supported.

The same reasons which made the materiality of the additional insurance a question for the jury required the court to submit the materiality of the embezzlements to that tribunal, and the exception based on the court's refusal to hold that they were material, as matter of law, cannot be sustained.

The court was clearly right in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant on the ground that the uncontradicted evidence showed that Schardt had had syphilis, when he had denied it in his answers. The evidence left it a controverted issue of fact whether Schardt had suffered from this disease, and the questions of his having had it, and of its materiality, were both for the jury. Equally unobjectionable was the refusal to direct a verdict on the ground that it was admitted that Schardt had had other diseases. The court left it to the jury to determine whether the sore throat and other ailments from which Schardt had suffered were really diseases within the policy, and also to say whether they were material to the risk. It is well settled that mere temporary ailments or affections, not of a serious or dangerous character, which pass away, and are likely to be forgotten, because they leave no trace in the constitution, are not to be regarded as diseases, within the meaning of a life insurance policy. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Union Trust Co. 112 U. S. 250, 28 L. ed. 708; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Moore, L. R. 6 App. Cas. 643; Manufacturers' Acci. Indemnity Co. v. Dorgan, 16 U. S. App. 290, 7 C. C. A. 581, 53 Fed. Rep. 945, 22 L. R. A. 620, and cases there cited; Mutual Ren. L. Ins. Co. v. Wise, 84 Md. 582; Wilkinson v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 30 Iowa, 119, 6 Am. Rep. 637; Fitch v. American Popular L. Ins. Co. 59 N. Y. 557, 17 Am. Rep. 872; Cushman v. United States L. Ins. Co. 70 N. Y. 72, 77; Goucher v. Northwestern Traveling Men's Assn. 20 Fed. Rep. 596; Illinois Masons' Ben. Soc. v. Winthrop, 85 Ill. 537; Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. McTague, 49 N. J. L. 587, 60 Am. Rep. 681; Brown v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 65 Mich. 308, 814; Hann v. National Union, 97 Mich. 518. The ailments which it was conceded Schardt had were of a character which made it entirely proper to submit to the jury the question whether they could be said to rise to the dignity of diseases, within the meaning of the policy. Morrison v. Muspratt, 4 Bing. 60; Fitch v. American Popular L. Ins. Co. 59 N. Y. 557, 17 Am. Rep. 872.

The trial court held, against the objection of defendant, that when Schardt was asked what his occupation was, he answered truly that he was a bank teller, and that the scope of the question was not such as to require him to add that he was an habitual embezzler. We concur in this view. Neither the company nor Schardt could have thus understood the question. The embezzling was merely misfeasance in his position as teller. He was an unfaithful bank teller. But nothing in the question called upon him to say whether he was a good or bad bank teller. In New York Bowery F. Ins. Co. v. New York F. Ins. Co. 17 Wend. 359, 367, the issue was whether a contract of reinsurance was avoided by the failure of the company seeking reinsurance to communicate to the reinsurer facts known to it reflecting on the character of the person originally insured. The supreme court of New York held that it was, but in doing so expressed, through Justice Bronson its opinion of what the duty of the person originally insured was in this regard: "The general doctrine (i. e. of concealment) on this subject, is not denied; but it is said that the character of Mortimer (i. e. the person originally insured) was not a fact material to the risk; that the person applying for insurance is not bound to say anything about his own character. The last branch of the remark is undoubtedly true. Had Mortimer applied to the defendants for insurance, he was not bound, nor could it be expected, that he should speak evil of himself. Good manners on the part of the underwriter, and self-respect on the part of the applicant, would forbid a conversation on the subject of character. If the underwriter wished information on that point, he would naturally seek it from some other source.

This passage is referred to with approval by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Sun Mut. Ins. Co. v. Ocean Ins. Co. 107 U. S. 485, 510, 27 L. ed. 845. Justice Bronson's discussion related to the disclosure of a fact not inquired about, and the rule there laid down was, of course, not intended to relieve an applicant from answering questions put to him, which, in their necessary scope, require statements from him which relate to his moral character. Nevertheless the reasoning of the court justifies the conclusion that the insured is not called upon to construe a simple question concerning his ordinary vocation into one calling for a statement of crimes or misfeasances of which he may have been guilty in pursuing such vocation. Then it is said that he had expressly warranted that, in his statements and answers in this application, no circumstances or information had been withheld touching his past and present state of health and habits of life, with which the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company ought to be made acquainted, and that his habit of embezzling should have been communicated, to comply with that warranty. We are of opinion that these words refer to questions and answers in the application, and are equivalent to a warranty that the answers to questions are full and complete. The habits of life referred to are those inquired about in the medical examination, and are those which have a direct relation to physical health, and could not be construed to refer to thefts or embezzlements of which the applicant may have been guilty, and concerning which no inquiry was made.

But even if Schardt was not required by any specific question to disclose the fact of his embezzlements, the policy would still be avoided, if it were material to the risk, and he intentionally concealed it from the company. This is not controverted. The issue of law between the parties is whether the policy would not be avoided, even if his failure to disclose it were due, not to fraudulent intent, but to mere inadvertence, or a belief that it was not material. It is insisted for the plaintiff in error that the motive or cause of the nondisclosure is unimportant, if the fact be found material to the risk, and was known to the insured when he obtained the insurance. The trial court took the other view, and instructed the jury accordingly. If this were a case of marine insurance, the contention for the plaintiff in error must certainly be sustained. The great and leading case on the subject is that of Carter v. Boehm. 3 Burr. 1905, where Lord Mansfield explained the effect of concealment of material facts in insurance to avoid the policy. He said: "Insurance is a contract upon speculation. The special facts, upon which the contingent chance is to be computed lie most commonly in the knowledge of the insured only. The underwriter trusts to his representation, and proceeds upon confidence that he does not keep back any circumstance in his knowledge to mislead the underwriter into a belief that the circumstance does not exist, and to induce him to estimate the risk as if it did not exist. The keeping back such circumstances is a fraud, and therefore the policy is void. Although the suppression should happen through mistake, without any fraudulent intention, yet still the underwriter is deceived, and the policy is void, because the risk run is really different from the risk understood and intended to be run, at the time of the agreement."

Carter v. Boehm was the case of insurance of a fort and warehouse in the East Indies against capture by the enemy; and, although not strictly a case of marine insurance, it has usually been treated as such, because of the resemblance of the risk, in its speculative character, to that of a merchant vessel in time of war. That it states the rule enforced by the courts of this country in cases of marine insurance is established by many decisions. Perhaps the one most recently considered by the Supreme Court of the United States was a case of reinsurance of a marine risk. Sun Mut. Ins. Co. v. Ocean Ins. Co. 107 U. S. 485, 27 L. ed. 837. The very marked difference between the situation of the parties in marine insurance and that of parties to a fire or life policy has led many courts of this country to modify the rigor of the doctrine in its application to fire and life insurance, and to lean towards the view that no failure to disclose a fact material to the risk, not inquired about, will avoid the policy, unless such nondisclosure was with intent to conceal from the insurer a fact believed to be material; that is, unless the nondisclosure was fraudulent. In marine insurance the risk was usually tendered and accepted when the vessel was on the high seas, where the insurer had no opportunity to examine her, or to know the particular circumstances of danger to which she might be exposed. The risk in such a case is highly speculative, and it is manifestly the duty of the insured to advise the insurer of every circumstance within his knowledge from which the probability of a loss can be inferred, and he cannot be permitted to escape the obligation by a plea of inadvertence or negligence. In cases of fire and life insurance, however, the parties stand much more nearly on an equality. The subject of the fire insurance is usually where the insurer can send its agents to give it a thorough examination, and determine the extent to which it is exposed to danger of fire from surrounding buildings, or because of the plan or material of its own structure. The subject of life insurance is always present for physical examination by medical experts of the insurer, who often acquire, by lung and heart tests, and by chemical analysis of bodily excretions, a more intimate knowledge of the bodily condition of the applicant than he has himself. Then, too, the practice has grown of requiring the applicant for both fire and life insurance to answer a great many questions carefully adapted to elicit facts which the insurer deems of importance in estimating the risk. In life insurance, not only is the applicant required to answer many general questions concerning himself and his ancestors, but he is also subjected to an extended examination concerning his bodily history. This was true in the case at bar. When the applicant has fully and truthfully answered all these questions, he may rightfully assume that the range of the examination had covered all matters within ordinary human experience deemed material by the insurer, and that he is not required to rack his memory for circumstances of possible materiality, not inquired about, and to volunteer them. He can only be said to fail in his duty to the insurer when he withholds from him some fact which, though not made the subject of inquiry, he nevertheless believes to be material to the risk, and actually is so, for fear it would induce a rejection of the risk, or, what is the same thing, with fraudulent intent. A strong reason why the rule as to concealment should not be so stringent in cases of life insurance as in marine insurance is that the question of concealment rarely, if ever, arises until after the death of the applicant, and then the mouth of him whose silence and whose knowledge it is claimed avoid the policy is closed. The application is generally prepared, and the questions are generally answered, under the supervision of an eager life insurance solicitor. Only the barest outlines of the conversations between the applicant and the solicitor are reduced to writing. The applicant is likely to trust the judgment of the solicitor as to the materiality of everything not made the subject of express inquiry, and, with the solicitor's strong motive for securing the business, there is danger that facts communicated to him may not find their way into the application. With respect to a contract thus made, it is clearly just to require that nothing but a fraudulent nondisclosure shall avoid the policy. Nor does this rule result in practical hardship to the insurer, for in every case where the undisclosed fact is palpably material to the risk the mere nondisclosure is itself strong evidence of a fraudulent intent. Thus, if a man about to fight a duel should obtain life insurance without disclosing his intention, it would seem that no argument or additional evidence would be needed to show the fraudulent character of the nondisclosure. On the other hand, where men may reasonably differ as to the materiality of a fact concerning which the insurer might have elicited full information, and did not do so, the insurer occupies no such position of disadvantage in judging of the risk as to make it unjust to require that before the policy is avoided it shall appear not only that the undisclosed fact was material, but also that it was withheld in bad faith. To hold that good faith is immaterial in such a case is to apply the harsh and rigorous rule of marine insurance to a class of insurance contracts differing so materially from marine policies in the circumstances under which the contracting parties agree that the reason for the rule ceases. The authorities are not uniform, and we are able to take that view which is more clearly founded in reason and justice. In England, the tendency of the courts has been to hold that the same rules apply to fire and life insurance as to marine insurance, in reference to the effect of the concealment of material facts. In Bufe v. Turner, 6 Taunt. 338, it was held 88 L. R. A.

that the failure to disclose a fact which the jury found material to a fire risk avoided the policy, although the nondisclosure was in entire good faith. In Huguenin v. Rayley, 6 Taunt. 186, and in Morrison v. Muspratt, 4 Bing. 60, the same ruling was made in cases of life insurance. In Lindenau v. Desborough, 8 Barn. & C. 586, which was also a case of life insurance and concealment, Bailey, J., stated his view thus: "I think that in all cases of insurance, whether on ships, houses, or lives, the underwriter should be informed of every material circumstance within the knowledge of the assured, and that the proper question is whether any particular circumstance was in fact material, and not whether the party believed it to be so."

The other judges expressed similar opinions. This language is quoted with approval by Sir George Jessel, M. R., in London Assurance v. Mansel, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 363. In Abbott v. Howard, Haynes, 381, the Irish exchequer chamber expressed approval of Lindenau v. Desborough, and followed it in a fire insurance case. In North British Ins. Co. v. Lloyd, 10 Exch. 523, the court of exchequer held, in a case of guaranty, that the rule as to concealments in life and marine insurance was the same. Chief Baron Pollock said: "It seems to us an incorrect proposition, that the same rule prevails in the case of guaranties as in assurances upon ships or lives, in which it is a settled rule that all material circumstances known to the assured are to be disclosed, though there be no fraud in the concealment. This is peculiar to the nature of such contracts, in which in general the assured knows, and the underwriter does not know, the circumstances of the voyage or the state of the health."

This case is cited by Mr. Justice Swayne in delivering the opinion of the court in Magee v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co. 92 U. S. 93, 23 L. ed. 699, on a question of guaranty; but such citation can hardly be regarded as a considered approval of the declaration by the court of exchequer that the rule as to concealments was the same in life as in marine insurance. In the course of the argument in Lloyd's Case, Baron Parke approves the statement of some able American law writer on insurance,—presumably Mr. Duer,—that the rule for the necessity of the disclosure of all material circumstances in cases of insurance is founded on mercantile usage, and not upon fraud. 10 Exch. 531. This only confirms our view that the rule had its origin in the peculiar exigencies of a very speculative business, to wit, marine insurance. To enforce it in respect to life insurance is to transfer the result of a usage prevailing in one branch of business to another, where the conditions are very different, and are of a character that prevents the possibility of the existence of a definite usage, well known to both parties, in respect to the contracts made. It is the business of shipowners and their brokers frequently to deal in insurance, and they may be presumed to know the usages prevailing with respect to contracts that they are constantly making. In life insurance the insured never makes a business of taking such insurances, and in most cases he takes but one policy. In Wheelton v. Hardisty, 8 El. &

Bl. 232, 233, the exchequer chamber held that an untrue statement of a material fact in a proposal for insurance, made, not by the insured, but by the person whose life was the subject of insurance, did not avoid the policy, in the absence of knowledge of its untruths by the insured. In this conclusion the court avowedly departed from the rule of law governing marine policies, by which such a statement is always treated as a warranty and condition of the policy. See especially the judgments of Martin and Bramwell, BB., and Crowder, J., pages 296, 298, 299. In Thomson v. Weems, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 671, which was a Scotch appeal in a life insurance case, Lord Blackburn said: "In policies of marine insurance I think it is settled by authority that any statement of a fact bearing upon the risk introduced into the written policy is, by whatever words and in whatever place, to be construed as a warranty, and prima facie, at least that the compliance with that warranty is a condition precedent to the attaching of the risk. I think that on the balance of authority the general principles of insurance law apply to all insurances, whether marine, life, or fire; see per Lord Eldon, C., in a Scotch appeal on a fire insurance case. Newcastle F. Ins. Co. v. Macmorran (July 10, 1815), 8 Dow, at page 262. No question arises on that in the present case, but I do not think that this rule as to the construction of marine policies is also applicable to the construction of life policies."

Mr. Pollock states, in the fourth edition of his work on Contracts (page 490, note 1), that Wheelton v. Hardisty virtually overrules Lindenau v. Desborough. It may be doubted whether it has this effect, because the latter case only established the doctrine that the withholding of any material fact "within the knowledge of the assured" avoided the policy, whereas in Wheelton v. Hardisty the untrue statement was not made by the assured, and its untruth was not known to him. But, while Mr. Pollock's view of the conflict between Lindenau v. Desborough and Wheelton v. Hardisty may not be precisely accurate, it is certainly true that the latter case, decided by the highest court in England before which the question has come in such a way as to require decision, is an authority for the proposition that the peculiar circumstances under which marine policies are issued require a construction of their terms that is not given to policies of life and fire insurance. It is said that the utmost good faith (uberrima fides) is required in all contracts of insurance, and hence the same rule of concealment must apply to life and fire insurance, and must avoid a policy for nondisclosure of a material fact, though in entire good faith. But it was the same standard of uberrima fides which held the insurer to his innocent misrepresentations as conditions precedent and warranties in marine insurance. Why should not a difference be also made in respect to innocent nondisclosures in life and fire insurance? The distinction made in Wheelton v. Hardisty between marine and life insurance policies seems to justify the language of Mr. Pollock [in his Contracts, 4th ed. §490], where, after stating the rule of concealments and misrepresentation in marine insurance, he says: "These rules have, in modern times at any rate, been uniformly treated both in law and in equity as determined by the exceptional and speculative nature of this particular contract, and not affording ground for any conclusions of general law. That they do not apply to the contract of life insurance is clear from the judgments in the exchequer chamber in Wheelton v. Hardisty, though a different opinion formerly prevailed, and in this very case was not contradicted in the court below."

Mr. Pollock refers to London Assurance v. Mansel, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 363, as deciding that a material concealment avoids a policy of life insurance, but says (at p. 491, note m): "Probably a material fact means for this purpose a fact such that its concealment makes the statement actually furnished, though literally true, so misleading as it stands as to be in effect untrue."

Certainly, this was all that it was necessary to decide in that case, although the words of Sir George Jessel are much broader. And what is of prime importance to us, the Supreme Court of the United States has expressly approved the conclusion which the master of rolls reached in that case, on its facts, with an equally express dissent from the wider effect of his language. Phenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Raddin, 120 U. S. 183, 30 L. ed. 644, and the remarks of Mr. Justice Gray on page 192, and page 647, 30 L. ed.

Coming now to the American authorities, we find very early in reported cases a disposition to depart from the strict rules of marine insurance law in the consideration of fire and life policies. In Farmers' Ins. & Loan Co. v. Snyder, 16 Wend. 481, 30 Am. Dec. 118, Chancellor Walworth, delivering the opinion of the supreme court of errors of New York, refers to the peculiar rule of construction applied to that "anomalous and informal instrument called a 'marine policy,'" and expresses the opinion that it is not to be applied in its strictness to fire policies. The same view is expressed in Jolly v. Baltimore Equitable Soc. 1 Harr. & G. 295, 18 Am. Dec. 288, by the court of appeals of Maryland. In Burritt v. Saratoga County Mut. F. Ins. Co. 5 Hill, 188, 40 Am. Dec. 345, Bronson, J., speaking for the supreme court of New York, after referring to the rule by which nondisclosure of material facts avoids a marine policy, although no inquiry be made, and although it is the result of innocent mistake or inadvertence, said (p. 192, p. 347 of 40 Am. Dec.):

"But this doctrine cannot be applicable,—at least not in its full extent,—to policies against fire. If a man is content to insure my house without taking the trouble to inquire of what materials it is constructed, how it is situated in reference to other buildings, or to what uses it is applied, he has no ground for complaint that the hazard proves to be greater than he had anticipated, unless I am chargeable with some misrepresentation concerning the nature or extent of the risk. It is therefore the practice of companies which insure against fire to make inquiries of the assured in some form, concerning all such matters as are deemed material to the risk, or which may affect the amount of premium to be paid. This is sometimes done by the conditions of insurance annexed to the policy, and sometimes by requiring the applicant to state particular facts in a written application for insurance. When thus called upon to speak, he is bound to make a true and full representation concerning all matters brought to his notice, and any concealment will have the like effect as in the case of a marine risk."

The use of "concealment," in this last passage, should be remarked. It means there a failure fully to answer a question put; and it was such a concealment which Sir George Jessel had to consider in London Assurance v. Mansel, and was defined by Sir Frederick Pollock. It is not a mere silence upon a matter not made the subject of inquiry. It is necessary to determine in which sense the word is used in decided cases, before their bearing on the present question can be clearly understood. Here we are considering only the duty of the insured in respect to something not inquired about. The Supreme Court of the United States, in Clark v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co., 49 U. S. 8 How. 285, 249, 13 L. ed. 1061, 1066, suggests a distinction between fire and marine insurance, in reference to the obligation of the insured to speak when not inquired of, and cites in support of it the Maryland and New York cases just referred to. In Gates v. Madison County Mut. Ins. Co. 5 N. Y. 469, 55 Am. Dec. 860, the court of appeals held that in the case of a fire policy, where the insured makes a full answer to all the questions put to him, he is not answerable for an omission to mention the existence of other facts, about which no inquiry is made, unless he withholds mention of them with intent to defraud. "He has a right to suppose that the insurer, in making inquiries in respect to particular facts, deems all others to be immaterial to the risk to be taken, or that he takes upon himself the knowledge, or waives information of them." See also Browning v. Home Ins. Co. 71 N. Y. 508, 27 Am. Rep. 867; Woodruff v. Imperial F. Ins. Co. 88 N. Y. 138; Short v. Home Ins. Co. 90 N. Y. 16, 48 Am. Rep. 188; Haight v. Continental Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 55. In Hartford Protection Ins. Co. v. Harmer, 2 Ohio St. 452, 59 Am. Dec. 684, which was a fire insurance case, the defense was made that, previous to the issuing of the policy, there had been a fire in the insured premises, which had not been disclosed to the insurer. The court charged the jury that, if they found the circumstance to be material to the risk, the policy was void, "whether concealment resulted from fraud, accident, or mistake." Judge Ranney—one of Ohio's greatest judges—presided at the circuit in this cause, and delivered the opinion of the supreme court. In the supreme court he expressed the view that he was in error in his charge, in thus enforcing the rule of marine insurance in a fire insurance case. Such an expression of opinion was not necessary to the conclusion in the case, but the high standing of the judge gives great weight to even his obiter dictum. He said: "It is not now true, whatever may be thought of the older authorities, that there is no difference in this respect [i. e. as to the rule of concealment] between marine and fire insurance, nor that a failure to disclose every fact material to the risk, upon which information is not asked for, or suppressed with a fraudulent intent, will avoid a policy of the latter description. The reason of the rule, and the policy in which it was founded, in its application to marine risks, entirely fail when applied to fire policies. In the former, the subject of insurance is generally beyond the reach, and not open to the inspection, of the underwriter, often in distant ports or upon the high seas, and the peculiar perils to which it may be exposed, too numerous to be anticipated or inquired about, known only to the owners and those in their employ; while in the latter it is, or may be, seen and inspected before the risk is assumed, and its construction, situation, and ordinary hazards as well appreciated by the underwriter as the owner. In marine insurance the underwriter, from the very necessities of his undertaking, is obliged to rely upon the assured, and has, therefore, the right to exact a full disclosure of all the facts known to him, which may in any way affect the risk to be assumed. But in fire insurance no such necessity for reliance exists, and, if the underwriter assumes the risk without taking the trouble to either examine or inquire, he cannot very well, in the absence of all fraud, complain that it turns out to be greater than he anticipated. And so are the latest and best authorities."

In Massachusetts, in the earlier authorities, the stringent rule of marine insurance as to concealments was declared applicable with all its rigor to fire policies. In Curry v. Commonwealth Ins. Co. 10 Pick. 535, 20 Am. Dec. 547, it was held that if the assured did not communicate facts within his knowledge which increased the risk, though he was not questioned concerning them, and though he supposed the facts not to be material, the policy was void. This can hardly be reconciled with the later cases in the same court. In Washington Mills Emory Mfg. Co. v. Weymouth & B. Mut. F. Ins. Co. 135 Mass. 503, the question was whether a failure to state that the insured did not own the land on which the buildings stood avoided the policy. No fraud appeared. The court said: "The defendant saw fit to issue this policy without any specific inquiries of the plaintiff as to the title to the land, and without any representations by the plaintiff upon this point. It was its own carelessness, and it cannot avoid the policy without proving intentional misrepresentation or concealment on the part of the plaintiff. An innocent failure to communicate facts about which the plaintiff was not asked will not have this effect;" citing Com. v. Hilds & Leather Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 186, 17 Am. Rep. 72; Fowle v. Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. 123 Mass. 191, 23 Am. Rep. 808; Walsh v. Fire Assn. of Philadelphia, 127 Mass. 383.

Nor does Chief Justice Shaw's definition of "concealment" in a fire insurance case seem to be as broad as that prevailing in marine insurance. In Daniels v. Hudson River F. Ins. Co. 13 Cush. 416, 59 Am. Dec. 192, he said in defining the term as used in a fire policy (p. 425, 59 Am. Dec. p. 196): "'Concealment' is the designed and intentional withholding of any fact material to the risk, which the assured in honesty and good faith, ought to communicate to the underwriter. Mere silence on the part of the assured, especially as to some matter of fact which he does not consider it important for the underwriter to know, is not to be considered as such concealment."

There are many other cases of fire insurance in which it is held that a nondisclosure of a material fact not inquired about does not avoid the policy unless it appears to have been withheld with fraudulent intent. Alkan v. New Hampshire Ins. Co. 53 Wis. 186; Vankirk v. Citizens' Ins. Co. 79 Wis. 627; Wylthville Ins. Co. v. Stultz, 87 Va. 629, 636; Sanford v. Royal Ins. Co. 11 Wash. 658; Petser Mfg. Co. v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 41 Fed. Rep. 271.

The number of life insurance cases in which the question has arisen is small. In Rawls v. American Mut. L. Ins. Co. 27 N. Y. 287, 84 Am. Dec. 280, the court of appeals held that, where an applicant for life insurance fully and truly answered all questions put to him by the company, the mere omission to state matter, though material to the risk, would not be a concealment, and would not affect the validity of the policy, on the ground that the applicant might presume that the insurer had questioned him on all subjects which he deemed material. In Mallory v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 47 N. Y. 52, 57, 7 Am. Rep. 410, the same court sustained a charge to the jury, that, if the applicant did not conceal any fact which, in his own mind, was material in making the application, the policy was not void. See also Cheever v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. 4 Am. Law Rec. 155. In Vose v. Eagle Life & Health Ins. Co. 6 Cush. 42, the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts announced the principle, as applicable to life policies, that the concealment of a material fact will avoid the policy, though it is the result of accident or negligence, and not of design. The case did not call for the application of such a principle. The applicant was asked if he was afflicted with any disease. He answered that he was not. At the time he had consumption, and had experienced several of the premonitory symptoms. His answers were made the basis of the policy. It is probable that the term "concealment," as used in this case, refers to an incomplete answer to a general question, rather than a failure to volunteer a fact not asked for, because the court uses in the opinion language which is incorporated in the headnote as follows: "It is the duty of the insured to disclose all material facts within his knowledge. Although specific questions applicable to all men are proposed by the insurers, yet there may be particular circumstances affecting the individual to be insured, which are not likely to be known to the insurers; and the concealment of a material fact, when a general question is put by the insurers, at the time of effecting the policy, which would elicit that fact, will vitiate the policy."

But, whatever the effect of this case, we think the modern tendency, even of Massachusetts decisions, is to require that a nondisclosure of a fact not inquired about shall be fraudulent, before vitiating the policy; and, as already stated, this view is founded on the better reason. The subject is by no means as clear, upon the authorities, as could be wished, and the text-writers find much difficulty in reconciling the cases. May, Ins. 3d ed. §§ 203, 208 L. R. A.

203, 207. We hold that the charge of the circuit court upon this question was correct.

It is also objected that the court was wrong in charging the jury that the burden of proof to establish the materiality of the misrepresentation or concealment, as well as the fraudulent intent, where that was necessary, was upon the defendant. Unquestionably, this is the general rule. 2 Greenl. Ev. 15th ed. § 898; Tidmarsh v. Washington F. & M. Ins. Co. 4 Mason, 439, 441; Fiske v. New England Marine Ins. Co. 15 Pick. 810; Jones v. Brooklyn L. Ins. Co. 61 N. Y. 79; Piedmont & A. L. Ins. Co. v. Ewing, 92 U. S. 877, 23 L. ed. 610; Grangers' L. Ins. Co. v. Brown, 57 Miss. 308, 84 Am. Rep. 446. It is urged for the defendant, however, that, because it was admitted that Schardt made an untrue answer concerning his other insurance, the presumption was that it was intentionally untrue, and that the court should have so instructed the jury. Had the defendant requested such a charge, the question would then have been presented for decision. But, instead of requesting such an instruction, defendant framed a single charge, which instructed the jury that they should presume, not only that the failure to mention the fact was intentional, but also that it was material. This was erroneous, and the court rightly refused to give it. But we do not think that the defendant was entitled to the instruction that the admission that Schardt had a policy in the New York Life Insurance Company, and failed to mention it, raised the presumption that his omission was intentional, or, what is the same thing, that it was fraudulent. There is a natural, and perhaps a legal, presumption of the continuance of a state of knowledge as of the state of sanity or marriage, and, it being admitted that Schardt once knew that he had taken this policy for $5,000, that he continued to know, and so remembered that he had the policy when he omitted to mention it. But the presumption is not conclusive. Men do forget entirely a fact previously known to them, and they do forget it temporarily, so that they may make an untrue statement inadvertently about it, though recently known to them. The possibility or probability of their doing so depends on the character of the fact in question, and all the circumstances under which the misstatement concerning it is made. There is also a presumption that a man does not make a fraudulent misstatement; but men frequently do nevertheless make such statements; and the question whether the presumption is overcome depends on the evidential weight to be given to all the circumstances, including possible motive, together with the positive evidence of witnesses. The two presumptions in this case covered the same ground, and were conflicting. Neither was conclusive, and it was for the jury to determine from all the circumstances what the truth was. It would seem proper that an instruction referring to one of these presumptions should also refer to the other, and should point out the duty of the jury to weigh the facts and circumstances in the light of both. Nothing here said, however, is intended to measure the duty of the court in instructing the jury as to presumptions from particular facts when other facts and circumstances affecting the weight of the presumption, or rebutting it, appear in the case, or when other and conflicting presumptions may also have application to possible phases of the evidence. It is, and must be, largely within the discretion of the court, even when a special instruction on the subject is requested, to determine in such case whether it is useful to call the attention of the jury to presumptions from particular facts at all, when such presumptions do not shift, as between the parties, "the duty of going forward with the evidence," as it is sometimes called. Instructions as to such presumptions are more or less in the nature of comment on the evidence, the scope of which is always within the discretion of the trial court.

For the error already referred to in the exclusion of evidence, the judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, with instructions to order a new trial.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed, in response to which, on April 14, 1896, Taft, Circuit Judge, handed down the following opinion:

This is a petition for rehearing by the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company, plaintiff in error. The action below was on a policy of life insurance, and resulted in a verdict and judgment against the defendant, the insurance company. In the opinion heretofore filed in the case we reversed the judgment of the court below for an error in excluding evidence, and for the guidance of the court below in a new trial we considered other questions upon the record. The Pennsylvania statute (act June 23, 1885, Laws 1885, p. 184, No. 101), which controlled the construction of the policy, provided, in effect, that no misrepresentation in the application should avoid the policy unless it was either made in bad faith or was material to the risk. It appeared upon the trial that in answering a question as to other life insurance upon his life, John Schardt, the insured, had mentioned three policies, aggregating $16,000, but had omitted to state one which he had for $5,000. The court below refused to charge the jury that the misrepresentation avoided the policy, even though it was not material to the risk, because necessarily made in bad faith. In this we held there was no error, and we are pressed by the petition for a rehearing to examine the correctness of our holding. The argument of the learned counsel is that a misrepresentation in bad faith, within the meaning of the statute, is an untrue statement, made under such circumstances that it would, if resulting in injury, support a recovery in an action for deceit at common law; and that in such an action, if the fact misrepresented is one concerning the defendant's own affairs, of which he must at some time have had personal knowledge, he is held to a knowledge and recollection of it at the time of the statement, and cannot be heard in defense to say that inadvertently and through forgetfulness he made the statement in the honest belief of its truth. Therefore it is said that in this case the court below should have told the jury that, as the insured must have known of the omitted policy when he took it, he is conclusively presumed to have known it when he signed his application, and so to have made the statement concerning his other insurance in bad faith. The argument is unsound. We have here to deal with the statutory meaning of the phrase "misrepresentation in bad faith." "In bad faith" is not a technical term used only in actions for deceit. It is an ordinary expression, the meaning of which is not doubtful. It means "with actual intent to mislead or deceive another." It refers to a real and actual state of mind capable of both direct and circumstantial proof. A man may testify directly to his knowledge and intention if they are in issue, and they may also be inferred from circumstances. If a man makes a statement in the honest belief that it is true, he does not make that statement in bad faith, even if his honest ignorance of the truth is the result of the grossest carelessness. The fact that he could only be ignorant through gross carelessness may be evidence to show that he was not ignorant, and therefore spoke in bad faith; but, grant his honest belief in his statement, and there cannot be bad faith on his part in the ordinary sense in which those words are used in the English language. This is the sense in which they are used in the Pennsylvania statute. Therefore it would clearly not have been bad faith in the insured if he made the statement concerning his other insurance in the honest belief in its truth, and omitted the $5,000 policy through forgetfulness and inadvertence.

Whether actual bad faith must be shown in common-law actions for deceit to justify a recovery has been the subject of much controversy, and it has been finally settled in England by the decision of the House of Lords in Derry v. Peek, L. R. 14 App. Cas. 837, that there can be no recovery in such an action whenever the defendant made the statement complained of in the honest belief of its truth, however unreasonable such belief. Such, too, would seem to be the holding of the Supreme Court of the United States in Lord v. Goddard, 54 U. S. 18 How. 198, 14 L. ed. 111 (see also Biggs v. Barry, 2 Curt. C. C. 259), though, in view of some of its later cases, the question may still be an open one in the latter court. Lehigh Zinc & I. Co. v. Bamford, 150 U. S. 665, 37 L. ed. 1215. There is much authority in this country supporting the view that an action for deceit may be maintained against one making an untrue statement, though in the honest belief of its truth, if there was no reasonable ground for such belief; or, to put it in another way, if he ought to have known the truth. Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. p. 585. Nearly all the cases upon which the petitioner relies are cases in equity of rescission or equitable estoppel in which bad faith is never indispensable as an element, and such of them as are English are expressly distinguished on this ground in Derry v. Peek; Burrowes v. Lock, 10 Ves. Jr. 470; Raley v. Williams, 73 Mo. 810; Bullis v. Noble, 36 Iowa, 618. The other English cases relied on are, of course, controlled by Derry v. Peek. The other American cases are cases of misrepresentation in contracts of insurance made the basis of the contract, and given a contractual effect. Towne v. Fitchburg Mut. F. Ins. Co. 7 Allen, 51; Byers v. Farmers' Ins. Co. 35 Ohio St. 606, 35 Am. Rep. 623. The condict of authority in regard to actions for deceit is whether actual bad faith is necessary to sustain the action, and not whether an untrue statement, founded on an honest belief in its truth, though inadvertently or forgetfully or negligently made, is a statement in bad faith. Here the statute expressly declares the material issue to be whether the misrepresentation was made in bad faith. This relieves us of all difficulty. The statute means what it says. It does not mean constructive bad faith. It does not mean gross negligence, which some courts have held sufficient to sustain an action for deceit. It means the same actual intent to mislead that must be found in convicting one of the crime of false pretenses, and surely honest belief in the misstatement, through forgetfulness and inadvertence, is a defense to such a charge. The reference to the essential basis of recovery in common-law actions for deceit only tends to confusion because of the conflict of authority, and is in no way helpful in construing the statute.

The petition is denied.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

Charles A. LEE, App't.,
v.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD

(116 Cal. 97.)

1. The provision against leasing a franchise so as to relieve it or property held under it from the liability of the lessor, grantor, lessee, or grantee, made by Const. art. 12, § 10, does not give an employee of the lessee of a railroad a right of action against the lessor company upon the fiction that it is his employer, but merely enables him to enforce his judgment, based on the negligence of his employer, against the property.
2. The lessor of a railroad which is leased under statutory authority without any provision exempting the lessor from liability remains liable for an injury resulting from the negligent omission of a duty owing by it to the public, such as the proper construction of its road.
3. The lessor of a railroad is liable to an employee of its lessee who is injured by the imperfect construction and maintenance of the rails and track.
4. A variance between an averment that plaintiff was an employee of a railroad company and proof that he was employed by its lessee and injured through the lessor's negligent construction of its road is immaterial.

(February 19, 1897.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by negligence for which defendant was responsible. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cole & Cole, for appellant:

A railway company leasing its road, even by consent of the legislature, does not thereby escape all responsibility to the public.

Boone, Corp., § 268.

But with the inhibition of the Constitution it is impossible to see by what refinement of reasoning it can be made to appear that a railroad corporation, by the mere act of leasing its railroad, escapes liability for injuries occurring in the operation of it.

The lease may be good and valid for all ordinary purposes; but the corporate property, the property held under and by virtue of the franchise, the property owned by the corporation, shall not, by the subterfuge of executing a lease, be exonerated from liabilities incurred in the operation, use, and enjoyment of that property.

If it had been intended to permit the limitation of liability by the act of leasing, that intention would have been expressed, but nothing of the kind appears.

It can hardly be maintained that a corporation, less powerful than the state, can thus divest itself of the obligations imposed by its charter.

Civ. Code, § 479; Harmon v. Columbia & G. R. Co. 28 S. C. 401; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Dunham, 68 Tex. 231; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Underwood, 67 Tex. 589; Palmer v. Utah & N. R. Co. 2 Idaho, 350.

If the constitutional provision possesses any significance whatever, the franchise and corporate property and the owner of them must be subject to prosecution for wrongs without regard to the control when the liability arose.

The right to exercise corporate power is itself a franchise.

The act in question is objectionable as embracing more than one subject, as well as in failing to express one of the subjects in its title.

Messrs. Bicknell & Trask for respondent.

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff brought this action against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him. He pleaded that the defendant was the owner of a certain railroad in the county of Los Angeles, and of its roadway, tracks, and appurtenances; that, at the time of the injuries complained of, he was employed by the defendant as a brakeman; and that while in the performance of his duties as brakeman, at a siding called Honby, on the line of the road he was thrown from an engine upon which he was riding, and sustained serious injuries. The cause of the accident was alleged to be the negligence of the defendant in imperfectly constructing the rails and track of the road at Honby, and in allowing this defectively constructed track to remain out of repair, inadequate, and unsafe. The answer admitted the ownership by defendant of the road in question, denied that defendant was engaged in the business of operating the road, denied that plaintiff was or ever had been in its employ as a brakeman, or in any other capacity, and denied the imperfect construction and want of repair of the rails and track. The jury returned a general verdict in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $8,000. It likewise made special findings of fact upon certain interrogatories presented. These findings, with certain other facts agreed to by counsel under stipulation, may thus be summarized: The defendant was the owner of the railroad upon which the accident complained of occurred, but, prior to the time of the accident, it had leased the road and all the rolling stock and property of every kind used upon or in connection with it to the Southern Pacific Company of Kentucky. The Southern Pacific Company was at the time of the accident in the exclusive operation of said railroad under the lease. The side track upon which the accident occurred had been constructed by the Southern Pacific Company as an aid or adjunct to the main line, but was the property of the defendant corporation. The plaintiff at the time of the accident, was in the employ of the Southern Pacific Company, and not of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. The trial court determined that a conflict existed between the special findings and the general verdict, and holding that, under the special findings, defendant was entitled to judgment, rendered its decision accordingly.

Section 10 of article 12 of the Constitution declares: "The legislature shall not pass any law permitting the leasing or alienation of any franchise so as to relieve the franchise or property held thereunder from the liability of the lessor or grantor, lessee or grantee, contracted or incurred in the operation, use, or enjoyment of such franchise, or any of its privileges." Upon this language, appellant contends that the Constitution gives one a right of action against the corporation which has owned property for an injury which has resulted to him in the use of such property in the hands of a lessee or grantee of the original owner, and from this he insists that his right of action against the defendant is established by the Constitution itself. The section in question was adopted by the constitutional convention without debate. It is a provision peculiar to this state. It has not so far received judicial interpretation; yet we think no difficulty need be experienced in arriving at its true meaning. It is not to be construed as a grant of authority to lease, but as a restriction upon the power of the legislature to make such grant of authority. Abbott v. Johnstown, G. & E. Horse R. Co. 80 N. Y. 27, 86 Am. Rep. 572; Central & M. R. Co. v. Morris, 68 Tex. 49. It declares: (1) That, if a lease or sale shall be made of the franchise or property of a corporation, the lessee or grantee shall take such franchise or property cum onere, subject to any of the liabilities of the grantor at the time existing and enforceable against the franchise or property. This provision is for the very obvious purpose of preventing a corporation, by selling or assigning its franchise or property, from saving harmless the franchise or property, and leaving remediless one who but for the lease or sale could have enforced against the property a judgment which he might recover. It is designed, further, as a declaration that the forfeiture of a franchise for an act committed or omitted by the charter corporation while it owned such franchise may be enforced after transfer of the franchise by sale or lease. (2) That, in the hands of the lessee or grantee, the franchise or other property shall be subject to the liabilities which may be incurred in its occupation, use, or enjoyment. Thus, the corporation owning the property will not be allowed to save it harmless by conveying it to another corporation. In the hands of the operating corporation, the franchise and property will still be liable,—the one to forfeiture at the instance of the state, the other to execution levy at the instance of any individual who has sustained loss or injury by reason of the wrongful acts of the operating corporation. But it will be noted that the section does not attempt to give, and is not intended to give, a personal action against a corporation where none existed before. It is designed to subject the franchise and property of a corporation, whether the franchise be exercised or the property be used by the corporation itself or by another, to liability for breach of duty. Otherwise a corporation might own a fully-equipped railroad; it might convey the road and the property used upon and with it to a lessee corporation owning no property whatsoever, and leave the conduct and operation of its property entirely to the lessee. A judgment creditor seeking to make good his claim against the operating company would find no property owned by it upon which it could levy. To prevent this and many other such evasions as might be instanced, the constitutional provision in question was adopted. So far as the case at bar is concerned, it can have but this application, and no more. It would enable the plaintiff injured by the negligence of his employer, the lessee company, to make good his judgment under appropriate procedure out of the leased property; but it would not operate to give the plaintiff, an employee of the lessee company, a right of action against the lessor company, upon the fiction that it was his employer.

Respondent contends that, having made a valid lease of all its railroad property to the Southern Pacific Company, it is absolved from all liability to plaintiff. Upon the part of the appellant it is contended that the lease is without sanction from the Constitution and laws of the state, and is therefore void. The question of the validity or invalidity of the lease is thus collaterally presented, but a decision upon it is not necessary to a determination of the rights of the parties hereto. If the lease were made without legislative sanction, it would be void, and, under all of the authorities, the lessor would continue liable for all the negligence of the lessee affecting the public, the latter being treated as operating the road as the mere agent of the lessor. Arrowsmith v. Nashville & D. R. Co. 57 Fed. Rep. 165; Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 101 U. S. 88, 25 L. ed. 952; York & M. L. R. Co. v. Winans, 58 U. S. 17 How. 80, 15 L. ed. 27; Washington, A. & G. R. Co. v. Brown, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 445, 21 L. ed. 675; Frazier v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 88 Tenn. 138; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Dunbar, 20 Ill. 628, 71 Am. Dec. 291; Central & M. R. Co. v. Morris, 68 Tex. 50; Nelson v. Vermont & C. R. Co. 26 Vt. 717, 62 Am. Dec. 614. But, conceding all that respondent claims as to the validity of the lease, it does not follow that respondent is relieved from liability to this plaintiff. The act which it is insisted affords legislative authority for the lease in question is entitled "An Act Permitting and Authorizing Railway and Other Corporations Organized under the Laws of This State, or of Any State or Territory of the United States of America, or Any Act of Congress of the United States of America, to do Business in This State on Equal Terms." It is found in the Statutes of 1880, at page 21. No terms of the act afford exemption in any respect to the lessor company. Where a statute authorizing leases contains no clause exempting the lessor from liability, it is well settled that the lessor still remains liable for an injury resulting from the negligent omission of a duty owed by it to the public, such as the proper construction of its road, station houses, etc.

In St. Louis, W. & W. R. Co. v. Ouri, 28 Kan. 622, a railway company constructed its track, and in the construction omitted to make sufficient cattle guards where the track entered and left a field. Thereafter the railroad was leased to another company, which, at the time of the injury complained of, was in the full possession and use of the track, and, by the terms of its lease, had contracted to discharge all statutory obligations and duties imposed upon the lessor company. The owner of land adjacent to the railroad brought his action against the lessor company to recover damages for injuries sustained to his crops by straying cattle. Justice Brewer, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Defendant contends that, where the statute authorizes the lease by one railway company to another of its track, the lessor company is not responsible for injuries caused by the torts of the lessee company, and in support of that doctrine cites some authorities. To a certain extent this proposition is true. If the injury results from negligence in the handling of trains or in the omission of any statutory duty connected with the management of the road,—matters in respect to which the lessor company could in the nature of things have no control,—then the lessee company will alone be responsible; but when the injury results from the omission of some duty which the lessor itself owes to the public in the first instance,—something connected with the building of the road,—then we think the company assuming the franchise cannot devert itself of responsibility by leasing its track to some other company. Thus, for instance, in the case at bar the defendant was charged with the duty of placing sufficient cattle guards before it either used this track which it constructed, or permitted anyone else to use it; and it cannot devert itself of responsibility for injuries resulting from such omission by leasing its track to some other company. The injury resulted directly from its own wrong, and not from any mere negligence on the part of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company. It cannot relieve itself by contracting with some other party to discharge its statutory duty. . . . The defendant omitted this duty, and by the statute is responsible for all damages sustained by reason of such omission." In Nugent v. Boston, C. & M. R. Co. 80 Me. 62, the defendant railroad, under express authority of law, had leased its road to the Portland & Ogdensburg Railroad, which latter road was engaged in its management and operation. A brakeman of the Portland & Ogdensburg road sued defendant for personal injuries received by reason of the negligent construction of an awning at a station house built by defendant company. The case received elaborate consideration. The action of the brakeman against the owning road was sustained, and the rule deduced in the following language: "Herein, as we think, lies the true distinction which marks the dividing line of the lessor's responsibility. In other words, an authorized lease, without any exemption clause, absolves the lessor from the torts of the lessee resulting from the negligent operation and handling of its trains and the general management of the leased road, over which the lessor could have no control. But for an injury resulting from the negligent omission of some duty owed to the public, such as the proper construction of its road, station houses, etc., the charter company cannot, in the absence of statutory exemption, discharge itself of legal responsibility." In Arrowsmith v. Nashville & D. R. Co. 57 Fed. Rep. 165, the same rule is enunciated, and numerous authorities cited in support thereof. Indeed, a somewhat extended examination of the cases justifies the conclusion that this principle, at least, is accepted without conflict. An analysis of the case of East Linn & R. R. Co. v. Culberson, 73 Tex. 875, 8 L. R. A. 567, a case upon which respondent strongly relies, will disclose that the law there enunciated is not only not at variance with the principle above mentioned, but embodies a distinct recognition of it. In that case an employee of the operating company sued the lessor company, claiming damages for injuries sustained by reason of defective appliances furnished by the operating company. The court held, and very properly, that such an action would not lie against the lessor company, and said: "It may be that if the injury had occurred by reason of a defect in the roadbed or track, and not by reason of a defect in the engine, the company charged with the duty of keeping up the road would be liable. But if it were true that the injury was caused entirely by another company operating the owner's road, and was inflicted upon one of its own employees by reason of a defect in machinery entirely under its control, it is difficult to see upon what principle of policy or justice the lessor should be held liable, merely because it owned the road."

In all cases where a valid lease is found (or as in this discussion, where it is assumed), the lessor company owes no duty whatsoever as an employer to the operatives of the lessee company. The claim of the relationship of employer and employee under such circumstances is a false claim and quantity. It does not exist. The responsibility of the lessor company when it attaches does not spring from this relationship, but arises from a failure of the lessor company to perform its duty to the public, of which public the employee of the operating company may be regarded as one. Thus, in those cases where the injury has resulted to an employee of the operating company by reason of the negligence of a fellow servant, or of want of skill and care of the lessor company in managing the road, or in negligence in furnishing suitable appliances, these and kindred matters being entirely and exclusively within the control of the lessee company, for injury which may result the lessor is in no way responsible. But, where injury has resulted to an employee of the operating company by reason of a failure of the lessor to perform its public duty, as in its failure to construct a safe road, as is here charged, the injured employee may sue the lessor company, as one of the public, for its failure to perform that duty, and not because, between himself and the lessor company, the relation of employee and employer, or any relation of contractual privity, exists. As is said in Nugent v. Boston & M. R. Co. 80 Me. 62, where the brakeman of the lessee road was injured by reason of the defective construction of the station house by the charter company: "Our opinion, therefore, is that the plaintiff had the lawful right, as brakeman on the train of the P. & O., to pass and re-pass by the Bethlehem station house of the defendant which, therefore, owed a duty to him to construct and maintain its station house there in such a reasonably safe manner that its awning would not injure him while in the performance of his duty with due care, and that a negligent breach of that duty by the defendant, having resulted in a personal injury to the plaintiff without fault on his part, he is entitled to maintain this action therefor." So, here, the charge against the defendant is that the injury resulted by reason of its imperfect construction and maintenance of the rails and track of its road. The verdict of the jury for plaintiff is its declaration that the charge was substantiated by the evidence, and the nature of the omission or dereliction is such as to entitle the plaintiff to compensation from the defendant herein for injuries which may have resulted to him by reason of it.

As has been indicated, the plaintiff in this case has averred that he was an employee of the defendant corporation. The proofs in this regard disclose that he was in the employ of the Southern Pacific Company. The variance we think to be immaterial. The averment could be eliminated, and a cause of action would still remain. Plaintiff has pleaded and shown to the satisfaction of the jury that he was not a trespasser upon the railroad at the time and place where he met with his injury, but that he was there under lawful employment; that, in pursuit of his vocation, he met with an injury occasioned by defendant's defective construction of its roadbed, for which injury the defendant is, in law, responsible. It follows that there is no irreconcilable conflict between the special findings and the general verdict of the jury, and the court should therefore have entered judgment for plaintiff.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the trial court to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff and appellant, under the general verdict of the jury.

legislature must affirmatively show that the provisions of the Constitution in regard to the passage of any law were substantially followed by the legislature in the passage of an act the validity of which is questioned.

4. While the journals of both houses of the legislature are entitled to absolute verity, and cannot be contradicted, yet, if the journals fail to show that any step required by the Constitution in the passage of a law was taken, such failure to show that such step was taken is conclusive evidence that it was not taken.

5. Neither house of the legislature can suspend the provision of the Constitution which requires three readings on separate days in each house except in case of urgency, and then only on an ye and nay vote by two thirds of the house, voting with reference to only one bill then before such house.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Ada County in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding to determine the fees to which defendant was entitled for recording a deed; plaintiff claiming that he could demand only the fees allowed by the act of March 12, 1897, and defendant claiming that that act was void and that he could demand fees allowed by the act of March 18, 1891. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Hawley & Puckett, A. A. Fraser, and W. E. Borah for appellant.

Mr. R. E. McFarland, for respondent, in support of petition for rehearing:

No one can point to a single provision of the Constitution, which requires that the journals show that the bill, together with the amendments thereto, was printed, or that it was read on three several days in each house previous to the final vote, or that the suspension of the the provisions of the Constitution were had by a yea and nay vote of two thirds of the members of either house, except as provided in § 18 at the request of three members present, nor is there a statutory provision requiring such to be had.

Can a court prescribe rules of procedure for a co-ordinate branch of the government?

Where the Constitution of a state requires certain procedure to be had in the passage of a bill, but does not require that the journals of the legislature show that such procedure was had, where it does not affirmatively appear by the journals that such procedure was not had, it will be deemed and held that such constitutional requirements were complied with.

Which would be more detrimental to the people, the wiping out of all laws from the adoption of the Constitution to the present time, or a decision holding that the ignoring of an insignificant rule of procedure in the passage of a bill does not invalidate a law?

The legislature is the sole judge of the facts constituting the urgency for dispensing with the constitutional provision requiring three readings on different days.

Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 48; Hull v. Miller, 4 Neb. 508.

The phrase "final passage" in § 15 of art. 3 of the Constitution is a technical parliamentary phrase, and means what in parliamentary law is meant thereby.

Cushing, Law and Pr. of Legislative Assemblies, p. 831, § 2129, pp. 864, 865, §§ 2228-2230, pp. 865-868, chaps. 15, 16, 17, and especially §§ 2232, 2233, 2235-2237, 2239, 2240, 2243, 2244, 2254, 2259 et seq. 2274; Jefferson's Manual, § 40, p. 86, § 42, p. 92, § 45, p. 95 et seq.; United States Senate Rules, 26; United States House Rules, 109, 110; United States Joint Rules, 12, 13, 16, 18; Cushing's Manual, cl. 218.

"Final passage" in this technical sense is the act whereby either house votes on the bill as a whole and passes it. It is called "final" because usually it does not occur until other votes have been taken with regard to the bill and as to the passage of parts of it and amendments to it.

Amendments subsequent to final passage in either house do not need the yeas and nays nor entry of anything more than the result of the vote.

Journals are records and in all respects touching proceedings under the mandatory provisions of the Constitution will be effectual to impeach and avoid the acts recorded as laws and duly authenticated, if the journals affirmatively show that these provisions have been disregarded. In the absence of such an affirmative showing, and even in cases of doubt, it will be presumed that a quorum was present; that the necessary readings occurred; that amendments made by one branch, though extensive, were germane; that they were concurred in by the other branch, though the journals may be silent.

Charles, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The controlling question in this case is, Is the act of March 12, 1897, regulating the fees and compensation of county and precinct officers, valid? Section 15, art. 3, of the Constitution, is as follows: "No law shall be passed except by bill, nor shall any bill be put upon its final passage until the same, with the amendments thereto, shall have been printed for the use of the members; nor shall any bill become a law unless the same shall have been read on three several days in each house previous to the final vote thereon: provided, in case of urgency, two thirds of the House where such bill may be pending may, upon a vote of the yeas and nays, dispense with this provision. On the final passage of all bills they shall be read at length, section by section, and the vote shall be by yeas and nays upon each bill separately, and shall be entered upon the journal; and no bill shall become a law without the concurrence of a majority of the members present." It is contended by the appellant that the provisions of said section of the Constitution were not complied with by the legislature in the passage of said act. The respondent contends that the presumption is that the legislature complied with all of the provisions of the Constitution, and that the court cannot go back of the enrolled bill for the purpose of ascertaining whether the provisions of the Constitution were followed or not. Upon this question there is some conflict of authority, but the great weight of authority and the soundest reasoning support the rule that the court not only may, but it is the imperative duty of the court, when this issue is before it, to look to the journals of the legislature, and see if, in passing the statute in question, the legislature had proceeded in the manner provided by the Constitution. By the terms of said section of the Constitution, supra, six things must be done in the passage of a law, to wit: First, the introduction of the proposed law by bill, necessarily in writing; second, the printing of the bill, with the amendments thereto; third, the reading of the bill on three several days in each house, previous to a final vote thereon; fourth, the reading of the bill on its final passage, section by section; fifth, a vote on the final passage by yeas and nays; sixth, the concurrence of a majority of the members present. These provisions are mandatory, and it is the imperative duty of the legislature to obey them. As we said in the case of Dunbar v. Canyon County Comrs. (decided at the present term) 49 Pac. 409, the duty of supporting the Constitution of the state is imposed upon all public officers by the solemn obligations of the official oath, which obligations cannot be discharged by disobeying, ignoring, and setting at naught the plain provisions of the Constitution, but only by obedience thereto. In construing said section of the Constitution, it is necessary to inquire into the extent of the application of the proviso which we find therein, viz.: "In case of urgency two thirds of the house where such bill may be pending may upon a vote of the yeas and nays dispense with this provision." A careful reading of the section shows that that part of the section which precedes the proviso consists of three separate clauses disjunctively stated. The first clause relates to the introduction of the bill, the second to the printing of the bill, the third to the reading on three several days. We are of the opinion from the context, from the conditions which the framers of the Constitution thought might arise, and from the apparent object which they had in view, that said proviso applies, and was only intended to apply, to the last clause preceding the proviso. It was not intended to authorize the legislature to dispense with the introduction of the proposed law by bill, nor was it intended to authorize the legislature to dispense with printing the bill. The framers of the Constitution evidently intended by said provision to put it in the hands of the legislature, in case of necessity to act promptly, to pass a bill in one, instead of not less than six days, and we can imagine a case where such urgency would exist. For instance, an insurrection should take place, and in order to quell it an appropriation should be promptly made, or the executive should be given some power not then given by existing law, or it should be necessary to forthwith enlarge the militia. The object of requiring the printing and three several readings on separate days is a good one. It was to insure the rights and interests of the people against hasty and inconsiderate legislation. The people in making and adopting the Constitution were not content with requiring the printing and reading one time only of bills, but have absolutely required that all bills shall be read on three several days in each house; and these several readings cannot be dispensed with, except "in case of urgency, two thirds of the house where such bill may be pending may upon a vote of the yeas and nays dispense with this provision."

The history of the passage of the act in question, first known as "Senate Bill No. 2," afterwards as "Substitute Senate Bill No. 2," as shown by the journals of both houses, is briefly as follows:

In the senate: "January 7. Senate bill No. 2, introduced by Senator Thomas A. Davis, read for the first time and referred to the committee on judiciary. January 11. Judiciary reported, and recommended that the bill be printed. January 20. Bill reported printed. Same day, senate bill No. 2, by Davis, was read the second time by title and referred to committee on engrossment. January 22.

Taken from committee on engrossment, and referred to general calendar for action of the committee of the whole. January 23. Senate bill No. 2 made a special order of business for Monday, January 27, at 2:35 o'clock P. M. January 26. Committee of the whole, having the bill under consideration, reported progress, and further consideration postponed for one week. February 2. The committee of the whole reported progress, and asked leave to sit again. February 8. Consideration by the committee of the whole. The committee reported progress, and recommends that the bill retain its place on the calendar, and asked and was granted leave to sit again. On motion of Senator Joseph C. Rich, Senators Ballentine (of Blaine), Keller and Davis (of Oneida) were appointed a special conference committee on senate bill No. 2, and as such to report at two o'clock P. M. to-morrow, and the further consideration of the bill postponed until that hour. February 10. Thomas A. Davis, of the special conference committee on senate bill No. 2, informed the senate that the house had passed a resolution to confer with a like committee from the senate on said matter, and asked further time, which was granted. February 15. Committee reported, and submitted a substitute for senate bill No. 2, and recommended the passage of the same. Substitute for senate bill No. 2, introduced by conference committee: 'An Act Regulating the Fees and Compensation of the Various County and Precinct Officers within the State of Idaho.' Read the first time by title, under suspension of § 15, art. 8, of the Constitution, and senate rules, by unanimous consent, and referred to committee on public printing. February 17. Substitute for senate bill No. 2 reported back, printed, and placed on the calendar. February 24. The committee of the whole reported progress in consideration of substitute senate bill No. 2, and asked and was granted leave to sit again. On the same day the following report was adopted by an aye and nay vote of 12 to 7, viz.: 'Mr. President: Your committee of the whole reports that it has had under consideration substitute for senate bill No. 2, and reports same back, with the recommendation that it do pass.' Substitute for senate bill No. 2 was filed for second reading, and considered engrossed. Motion made to reconsider the report of the committee of the whole was laid on the table on an aye and nay vote of 13 to 7. Substitute bill No. 2 was considered engrossed, and filed for third reading. February 16. Substitute to senate bill No. 2 read the third time, and passed by an aye and nay vote of 15 to 5. March 8. On motion the senate concurred in house amendments to substitute senate bill No. 2, with the exception of the twenty-second amendment, and the house notified of such concurrence. On the same day the senate received a message from the house to the effect that the house of representatives had passed substitute to senate bill No. 2 by conference committee, as amended. On the same day the bill was reported correctly enrolled, and signed by the president of the senate and speaker of the house and transmitted to the governor."

In the house: "February 2. Message from the senate that the senate had passed substitute to senate bill No. 2, and that same was therewith transmitted. March 1. Mr. Keat moved that the rules of the house, and article 3, § 15, of the Constitution, be suspended, and all senate and house bills, joint resolutions, and memorials on first and second reading be read first and second time by title, and referred to their appropriate committees, which motion was adopted by an aye and nay vote of 24 to 5; and under the said motion substitute for senate bill No. 2, by conference committee, 'An Act Regulating the Fees and Compensation of the Various County and Precinct Officers within the State of Idaho,' was read the first and second time by title, and referred to committee on county officers. March 2. The committee on county officers reported the bill back, and recommended its passage. The bill was then read a third time, and referred to the judiciary committee. March 4. The committee on judiciary reported the bill back, with amendments, and recommended that said amendments be considered seriatim the house, and recommended that the bill, with the amendments thereto, do pass. March 6. Mr. Keats offered two amendments which were adopted. Mr. Rogers offered an amendment which was rejected. Mr. Wright offered two amendments which were rejected. The committee of the whole recommended twenty amendments, numbered from one to twenty, respectively. The question was then put, 'Shall the bill as amended be passed to third reading?' and which question prevailed. Mr. Rice then offered an amendment which was adopted. Then, on an aye and nay vote, 21 to 18, the vote to pass the bill to third reading was reconsidered. Mr. Workman moved, as a substitute to amendment No. 13 by committee of the whole, the amendment herein referred to, as an amendment to the amendment by the committee of the whole, being amendment No. 13. The question was then put, 'Shall the substitute motion be adopted?' and carried by an aye and nay vote of 25 to 10, and so the substitute motion was adopted. It was then ordered that the bill be passed to third reading. Mr. Elder then moved that the rules of the house and § 15 of art. 3 of the Constitution be suspended, and senate bill No. 2 be considered engrossed, read a third time, and placed upon its final passage, which motion was, on an aye and nay vote of 23 to 8, declared carried. And so the rules and Constitution were suspended, and the house passed to the order of third reading of house bills. Senate bill No. 2 by conference committee, 'An Act Regulating the Fees and Compensation of the Various County and Precinct Officers within the State of Idaho,' was read a third time. The bill was then put on its final passage, on an aye and nay vote, and carried, the vote being 32 to 3. March. 8. Message received from the senate as follows: 'Mr. Speaker: I am instructed to inform your honorable body that the senate has had under consideration and concurred in house amendments to substitute to senate bill No. 2, with the exception as to the 22d amendment, which has been amended as follows: In line 1, after the word "subdivision," strike out the figure "5" and insert the figure "3," in line 2, strike out the figures "79" and insert the figures "78,"— which is herewith transmitted. Respectfully, Wm. V. Helfrich, Asst. Secretary.' On the same day the committee on printing reported that it had had printed amendments to substitute for senate bill No. 2, original amendments returned. Workman moved that the House concur in, the amendment proposed by the senate as to senate bill No. 2, in 22d amendment; subdivision 5 to be changed to 3, and to be in line 78 instead of line 79, which motion prevailed."

And this is the record as it appears in the journals of the two houses. While many irregularities worthy of criticism appear in this record, we will only call attention to some of the more flagrant violations of the Constitution. As shown by the senate journal, substitute to senate bill No. 2, offered by the conference committee, which was in effect and in fact a new bill, was read the first time by title; the senate assuming to suspend § 15 of art. 3 of the Constitution without an aye and nay vote, a thing which cannot be done under the provisions of the Constitution. It does not appear from the journal of the Senate that substitute to senate bill No. 2 was read the second time. The recital that it "was filed for a second reading" does not show that it was read a second time. Each house is required by § 13, art. 3, of the Constitution, to keep a journal of its proceedings. This means that the journal shall show all the proceedings of the house, and all of the steps taken in the passage of every bill. By reason of this provision the journal becomes, not only the best evidence, but the exclusive evidence, of what was done by the house keeping such journal, and courts must impute to the record and statements in the journal absolute verity. The recitals in the journal are conclusive and cannot be contradicted. Burkhart v. Reed, 2 Idaho, 470; Clough v. Curtis, 2 Idaho, 489; Wright v. Kelly (Idaho) 48 Pac. 565; Bellevue Water Co. v. Stockslager, Id. 503; Blaine County v. Heard (Idaho) 45 Pac. 890. In the passage of a bill by either house, the journal of such house must show affirmatively that all the requirements of the Constitution were complied with by such house. To suspend the provision in regard to reading all bills on three several days in each house, an urgency must exist; and the suspension must be by an aye and nay vote, and by two thirds of the house. It is difficult to see that an urgency could possibly exist in the passage of ordinary measures like the act in question, but, waiving that question, it appears that the senate assumed to suspend the reading of the bill at length without an aye and nay vote thereon, in absolute violation of the Constitution. If either House can disregard one plain provision of the Constitution, then it may disregard all of its provisions, and the Constitution, instead of being the fundamental law of the land, is a mere sham, an idle mockery, a nullity. In the house of representatives it does not appear from the journal that the bill was read a first and second time on several days, or that the provision in this regard was suspended. True it is that on the 1st day of March Mr. Keat introduced in the house an omnibus motion suspending § 15, art. 3, of the Constitution, and dispensing with the reading in full of the first and second times of "all senate and house bills, joint resolutions, and memorials," and permitting the same to be read the first and second time by title only. This provision of the Constitution is to be suspended only in case of urgency, and only with reference to a bill which is then pending and before the house for consideration at the time of the suspension. It cannot be suspended generally. It cannot be suspended for one day. If the legislature, or either house thereof, can suspend it for one day, then such house could suspend it for the entire session, and as to all business, and the provision would be an idle toy to be played with and tossed aside at will. The house adopted twenty-two amendments, and it does not appear from the house journal that these amendments were read on three several days. This is required by the Constitution. Nor does it appear that these amendments were printed prior to the final passage of the bill by the house, which the Constitution absolutely requires. The journal of the senate fails to show that the bill was read on three separate days in the senate after it had been amended twenty-two times by the house, or that it was read in the senate at all after it was amended by the house, or that the bill with the house amendments thereto was ever finally voted on in the senate after it had passed the house. A bill may originate in and pass one house, and then be sent to the other house, and be amended in the latter house so as to change the entire purpose of the bill. In such event, if the amended bill is permitted to become a law without having been read or passed by the other house, it would be a violation of the Constitution. It was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to require amendments that might be adopted to a pending bill to be read three times on several days, the same as original bills, or sections of the pending bill which is amended. In the case at bar, speaking from the journal of the senate, the bill in question which passed the house after being materially changed, was never read in the senate or put to a vote on final passage in the senate. A bill which passes the house, and is materially changed by amendment by the other house, and then sent back to the house where it first originated, must go through the same procedure as to reading and final vote as if it was an original bill. The reason for this rule is obvious. In the case at bar, substitute to senate bill No. 2, after it was amended in twenty-two instances, was not the bill which the senate passed and sent to the house, and must, under the Constitution, when returned to the senate, be treated (at least, so far as the amendments are concerned) by the senate as if it originated in the house. The mere declaration by the senate that "we concur in the house amendments" does not answer the requirements of the Constitution.

The plaintiff, in preparing his case, procured a transcript of the journals of both houses, certified by the secretary of state to be full and correct. This is the correct practice, and we commend it.

The court should treat the enrolled bill (the fact that it is regularly enrolled) as presumptive evidence that the legislature, in passing it, performed all of its duties; but this presumption is subject to rebuttal. And when the validity of a statute is attacked the party attacking should show by the journals that at least one requirement of the Constitution was disregarded, and the failure of the journals to show that any constitutional requirement was obeyed is conclusive evidence that such requirement was not obeyed. If all the requirements of the Constitution had been complied with, as to reading, printing, and voting on final passage, in regard to the bill in question, by both houses, then those portions of the act in question which relate to state officials are void for the reason that such matter is not embraced in the title to said act, as required by § 16, art. 3, of the Constitution. We only refer to this for the reason that it tends to show how lightly the legislature treated the provisions of the Constitution in passing the act in question. The object of the act in question, which was to cut down the excessive cost of litigation, and correct abuses in the regulation of fees of county and precinct officers, is a good one, and one with which this court is in full sympathy. It is therefore with great reluctance that we hold the act in question to be void, but there is no other alternative.

The conclusions reached, after a careful and full consideration, are: First. To determine the validity of a statute, the court can and should, in the proper case, go back of the enrolled bill to the journals of both houses, to ascertain whether the requirements of the Constitution were complied with by the legislature in enacting such statute. Second. The act in question is void in toto, by reason of the failure of the journals of the legislature to show a compliance with the requirements of the Constitution in passing said act.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the trial court to enter judgment in favor of the defendant. Costs of appeal awarded to the appellant.

Sullivan, Ch. J., and Huston, J., concur.

A petition, for rehearing having been filed, Huston, J. on August 24, 1897, handed down the following response:

The learned attorney general, on behalf of the respondent, has filed a voluminous petition for rehearing which we have carefully considered. A perusal of the same shows that the acquaintance of the attorney general with the arguments of appellant, printed and oral, is as limited as is his knowledge of the decision heretofore rendered in this case. In the petition he says: "No reference is made in the opinion of the court herein to said § 13 [art. 3], and we are of the opinion that the court, in deciding said case, overlooked said section." An inspection of the opinion will show that we did refer to § 13, art. 3, of the Constitution; and for the benefit of the learned attorney general, whose knowledge of the said opinion seems to have been derived from newspaper articles and street-corner talks, we will here repeat what we said in the original opinion in regard to said section, to wit: "Each house is required, by § 13, art. 3, of the Constitution, to keep a journal of its proceedings. This means that the journal shall show all of the proceedings of the house, and all of the steps taken in the passage of every bill. By reason of this provision the journal becomes, not only the best evidence, but the exclusive evidence of what was done by the house keeping such journal, and courts must impute to the record and statements in the journal absolute verity." We will add to what was said before that said section requires each house to keep a full, not a partial, record of its proceedings. If, in the face of this provision, the legislature can omit from its journals part of its proceedings, it may omit other parts of its proceedings without limit, and the section would be almost, if not wholly, ineffectual. The authorities cited to establish the rule that mere silence of the journal to show that a certain thing was done does not prove that it was not done, we apprehend, arose under Constitutions in many respects unlike ours. An examination of many of the authorities cited by the respondent to support this contention seems to limit the rule to those acts which the Constitution does not require to appear in the journal. But our Constitution clearly intends that all of the proceedings of each house shall appear in the journal. Hence we must presume that everything done by each house, all of its proceedings, and nothing else, appear in the journal. In fact, the legislature seems to have taken this view, and has caused the minute details of its proceedings to be recorded in its journals.

Again, the attorney general is in error when he says in the petition for rehearing, at page 5, that "appellant has never contended that the journals do not show that the yea and nay vote was taken upon the final passage of the bill." We respectfully refer the attorney general, and all other persons who entertain erroneous ideas of the court's rulings and what was argued before the court, to page 9 of appellant's brief, where the following language is found, to wit: "Calling the court's attention to the final passage of this act through the senate, we find the following journal entry in regard thereto (p. 12, folio 85, of the transcript): 'Motion. Senator J. C. Rich moved to concur in the house amendment to substitute senate bill No. 2, with the exception of the 22d amendment. Carried, and the house was notified.' Appellant contends that, as this was the final passage of the act through the senate, it was a violation of, and did not comply with, the requirements of the Constitution as to such final passage, as there was no vote taken by ayes and nays, which the Constitution requires to be done." So the record does show that the appellant argued and contended that the senate never passed the act in question; this contention being necessarily based upon the idea that the bill which the senate first passed was materially changed by the house, and after being so changed was not read or passed on an aye and nay vote in the senate.

It is a matter of regret that the attorney general of the state should ridicule any of the provisions of the Constitution, or speak of them as "insignificant," or use this language, which we find in the petition for rehearing: "We admit that the Constitution of the state is surrounded with a halo of sanctity and solemnity, a great part of which is fictitious." The Constitution requires certain things to be done in connection with the passage of any and all laws. It is true that the doing of these things is a matter of procedure. But by what right shall anyone be permitted to say that any of the things required by the Constitution to be done are "insignificant," and may therefore be omitted? Has anyone more right to say that one of the things required by the Constitution is insignificant and may be omitted than he has to say that any other thing required is insignificant and may therefore be omitted? If the right to ignore one provision exists, the right to ignore all exists. If the court must wink at one violation of the Constitution, it must wink at other violations of it. If the court must approve one violation of the Constitution, it must, to be consistent, approve other violations of it. We must be subject to the Constitution, or else subject to the whims of those individuals who treat the sanctity of the Constitution as fictitious and its provisions as insignificant. We cannot serve both God and Mammon. We must travel either the one road or the other. We think that safety and security demand that we stick to the letter and spirit of the Constitution, that we obey all of its mandates, until the people, the source of all power, who made it, change its provisions. Let us obey the Constitution in all of its requirements, and treat all of its provisions as important.

Mr. Sutherland, in his work on Statutory Construction, speaking of another provision at § 79, says: "The efficiency of this constitutional remedy to cure the evil and mischief which has been pointed out depends on judicial enforcement; on this constitutional injunction being regarded as mandatory, and compliance with it essential to the validity of legislation. The mischief existed notwithstanding the sworn obligation of legislators; it might be expected to continue notwithstanding that that obligation is formulated and emphasized in this constitutional injunction, if it be construed as addressed exclusively to them, and only directory. It would, in a general sense, be a dangerous doctrine to announce that any of the provisions of the Constitution may be obeyed or disregarded at the mere will or pleasure of the legislature, unless it is clear beyond all question that such was the intention of the framers of that instrument. It would seem to be a lowering of the proper dignity of the fundamental law to say that it descends to prescribing rules of order in unessential matters which may be followed or disregarded at pleasure. The fact is this: that whatever constitutional provision can be looked upon as a directory merely is very likely to be treated by the legislature as if it was devoid of moral obligation, and to be therefore habitually disregarded." Mr. Black, in his work on Interpretation of Laws, at § 18, quotes from the above section of Mr. Sutherland's work with approval, and adds: "As a rule, therefore, whenever the language used in a Constitution is prohibitory it is to be understood as intended to be a positive and unequivocal negation." Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations (5th ed. p. 93), says: "But the courts tread upon very dangerous ground when they venture to apply the rules which distinguish directory and mandatory statutes to the provisions of a constitution. Constitutions do not usually undertake to prescribe mere rules of proceeding, except when such rules are looked upon as essential to the thing to be done, and they must then be regarded in the light of limitations upon the power to be exercised. It is the province of an instrument of this solemn and permanent character to establish those fundamental maxims, and fix those unvarying rules by which all departments of the government must at all times shape their conduct; and, if it descends to prescribing mere rules of order in unessential matters, it is lowering the proper dignity of such an instrument, and usurping the proper province of ordinary legislation. We are not, therefore, to expect to find in a constitution provisions which the people, in adopting it, have not regarded as of high importance, and worthy to be embraced in an instrument which, for a time at least, is to control alike the government and the governed, and to form a standard by which is to be measured the power which can be exercised as well by the delegate as by the sovereign people themselves. If directions are given respecting the times or modes of proceeding in which a power should be exercised, there is at least a strong presumption that the people designed it should be exercised in that time and mode only; and we impute to the people a want of due appreciation of the purpose and proper province of such an instrument, when we infer that such directions are given to any other end. Especially when, as has been already said, it is but fair to presume that the people in their constitution have expressed themselves in careful and measured terms, corresponding with the immense importance of the powers delegated, and with a view to leave as little as possible to implication." Continuing, Judge Cooley says (p. 94): "There are some cases, however, where the doctrine of directory statutes has been applied to constitutional provisions; but they are so plainly at variance with the weight of authority upon the precise points considered that we feel warranted in saying that the judicial decisions as they now stand do not sanction the application." And at page 156 he further says: "It is a necessary attribute of sovereignty that the expressed will of the sovereign is law; and while we may question and cross-question the words employed, to make certain of the real meaning, and may hesitate and doubt concerning it, yet, when the intent is made out, it must govern, and it is idle to talk of forms that should have surrounded the expression, but do not. But when the legislative power of a state is to be exercised by a department composed of two branches, or, as in most of the American states, of three branches, and these branches have their several duties marked out and prescribed by the law to which they owe their origin, and which provides for the exercise of their powers in certain modes and under certain forms, there are other questions to arise than those of the mere intent of the law-makers, and sometimes forms become of the last importance. For in such case not only is it important that the will of the lawmakers be clearly expressed, but it is also essential that it be expressed in due form of law since nothing becomes law simply and solely because men who possess the legislative power will that it shall be, unless they express their determination to that effect, in the mode pointed out by the instrument which invests them with the power, and under all the forms which that instrument has rendered essential." Mr. Black, in his work on Constitutional Law, at page 836, says: "The constitutions of many of the states require that a bill, before it shall become law, shall be read a certain number of times (usually two or three) in each house. In respect to the manner of such reading the provision is considered merely directory, but not so with regard to the fact of its being read. If the constitution is not obeyed in this latter particular the statute is void." In harmony with the above views, with which we are in full accord, we are compelled to hold that the provisions of our Constitution limit the power of the legislature in the enactment of laws to the mode therein prescribed.

The persistent contention of the respondent that the court should not go back of the enrolled bill to the legislative journals to see if the act in question was passed in the mode required by the Constitution in face of the fact that this court has repeatedly held that it may do so, is ill advised and not worthy of consideration. To hold in accordance with this contention of respondent would make the provisions of the Constitution merely directory and subject to the whims of either house of the legislature, contrary to the expressed will of the people. That the court may go to the journals of the legislature to see if the provisions of the Constitution were obeyed by the legislature in the enactment of a law had become the established doctrine of this state before the convening of the last session of our legislature, and the legislature was fully aware of this settled rule when it attempted to pass the act in question. The rules of construction applicable to statutes and constitutional provisions should be permanent and unchangeable. On this point Judge Cooley, in his work cited supra, at page 67, says: "A cardinal rule in dealing with written instruments is that they are to receive an unvarying interpretation, and that their practical construction is to be uniform. A constitution is not to be made to mean one thing at one time and another at some subsequent time, when the circumstances may have so changed as perhaps to make a different rule in the case seem desirable. A principal share of the benefit expected from written constitutions would be lost if the rules they established were so flexible as to bend to circumstances or be modified by public opinion. It is with special reference to the varying modes of public opinion, and with a view to putting the fundamentals of government beyond their control, that these instruments are framed, and there can be no such steady and imperceptible change in their rules as inheres in the principles of the common law. Those beneficent maxims of the common law which guard person and property have grown and expanded until they mean vastly more to us than they did to our ancestors and are more minute, particular, and pervading in their protections; and we may confidently look forward in the future to still further modifications in the direction of improvement. Public sentiment and action effect such changes, and the courts recognize them; but a court or legislature which should allow a change in public sentiment to influence it in giving to a written constitution a construction not warranted by the intention of its founders, would be justly chargeable with reckless disregard of official oath and public duty; and, if its course could become a precedent, these instruments would be of little avail. The violence of public passion is quite as likely to be in the direction of oppression as in any other; and the necessity for bills of rights in our fundamental laws lies mainly in the danger that the legislature will be influenced, by temporary excitements and passions among the people, to adopt oppressive enactments. What a court is to do, therefore, is to declare the law as written, leaving it to the people themselves to make such changes as new circumstances may require. The meaning of the Constitution is fixed when it is adopted, and it is not different at any subsequent time when a court has occasion to pass upon it."

There is no intention disclosed in the Constitution to make the legislature the exclusive judges of the constitutionality of its acts. The legislature must, in the very nature of things, use its judgment, in the first instance, as to whether a proposed action by it is constitutional or not, or whether it is acting in the manner required by the Constitution. But whether the legislature should make an honest mistake, or perversely violate the Constitution, the remedy for such violation exists, nevertheless, and courts must refuse to aid and abet such violations of the Constitution. The court does this by refusing to recognize the validity of any act passed in violation of the mandates of the Constitution.

The learned counsel for respondent (the attorney general) cites the provisions of § 9, art. 3, of our Constitution, to the effect that each house "shall determine its own rules and proceedings," etc. We are somewhat at a loss to understand the pertinency of this quotation in the consideration of the questions involved. Does the learned attorney general desire to be understood as claiming that this is a controlling provision of the Constitution, and is to be taken literally, without regard to the provision of § 15, art. 3? This would be a strange and unheard-of rule of construction, but without it the quotation of counsel is idle.

In preparing his petition for rehearing the learned attorney general says: "Nor have they [counsel for appellant] ever claimed that the journals affirmatively show that the other requirements of the Constitution relating to the passage of the bill were not complied with." This proposition is on a par with that other proposition so often reiterated, that this court, in its opinion in this case, assumed to be the judge as to whether an "urgency," as provided in § 15 of art. 3, existed. Is it carelessness or fatuity which causes such an entire misstatement of fact as well as conclusion? What the court did say, in effect, was this: That as the Constitution authorized the suspension by the legislature of the provisions of § 15, art. 3, of the Constitution, with reference to the reading of bills on three several days, only when an urgency requiring such suspension existed, the fact of such urgency must appear upon the record; otherwise the whole purpose and intention of the provision would be defeated. To sum up this whole matter in one sentence: What this court has held is this: Where the mandatory provisions of the Constitution require certain things to be done by the legislature in the enactment of laws, the court will hold that where a law has been passed without a compliance with such mandatory constitutional provisions, the same is unconstitutional. Against this conclusion as a legal proposition, we have not been, nor shall we ever be, cited to a single authority or principle predicated upon principles upon which our government is founded.

We cannot better answer the oft reiterated claim, not argument, against the decision in this case, that it assumes that the amendments to a bill must be subjected to the same constitutional rules as the original bill, than by quoting from some of the very numerous authorities cited by the learned attorney general in his petition for a rehearing, as illustrative of the utter inutility of the rule contended for by him. We cite from Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, 5th ed. p. 167, note 3: "A practice has sprung up of evading these constitutional provisions by introducing a new bill after the time has expired when it may constitutionally be done, as an amendment to some pending bill, the whole of which, except the enacting clause, is struck out to make way for it. Thus, the member who thinks he may possibly have occasion for the introduction of a new bill after the constitutional period has expired, takes care to introduce sham bills in due season which he can use as stocks to graft upon, and which he uses irrespective of their character or contents. The sham bill is perhaps a bill to incorporate the city of Siam. One of the member's constituents applies to him for legislative permission to construct a dam across the Wild Cat river. Forthwith, by amendment, the bill entitled a bill to incorporate the city of Siam has all after the enacting clause stricken out, and it is made to provide, as its sole object, that John Doe may construct a dam across the Wild Cat. With this title and in this form it is passed; but the house then (considerately) amends the title to correspond with the purpose of the bill, and the law is passed, and the Constitution at the same time saved. This trick is so transparent, and so clearly in violation of the Constitution, and the evidence at the same time is so fully spread upon the record, that it is a matter of surprise to find it so often resorted to." In the case of People, Barnes, v. Starnes, 35 Ill. 121, 85 Am. Dec. 343, it is said the courts should not enforce a legislative act unless there is record evidence from the journals of the two houses that every material requirement of the Constitution has been satisfied. In the case of Miller v. State, 3 Ohio St. 475, much relied upon by respondent, we find that the constitutional provision was as follows: "Every bill should be fully and distinctly read on three different days, unless, in case of urgency, three fourths of the house in which it shall be pending shall dispense with this rule." The court held that as the record did show that the bill had been read a third time, although omitting to show that it had been read "fully and distinctly," there was a sufficient compliance with the constitutional provision. In commenting upon this case, Judge Cooley says (Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. p. 162, note 1): "The distinctness with which any bill must be read cannot possibly be defined by any law; and it must always, from the necessity of the case, rest with the house to determine finally whether in this particular the Constitution has been complied with or not; but the rule respecting three several readings on different days is specific, and capable of being precisely complied with, and we do not see how, even under the rules applied to statutes, it can be regarded as directory merely, provided it has a purpose beyond the mere regular and orderly transaction of business. That it has such a purpose, that it is designed to prevent hasty and improvident legislation, and is therefore not a mere rule of order, but one of protection to the public interests and to the citizens at large, is very clear; and independent of the question whether definite constitutional principles can be dispensed with in any case on the ground of their being merely directory, we cannot see how this can be treated as anything but mandatory."

The respondent seriously attacks that part of the decision in this case which holds that amendments to a pending bill must be read on three several days, in each house, unless in case of urgency the three readings on several days be dispensed with by two thirds of the house on an aye and nay vote. That this rule is correct, and in harmony with the letter and spirit of our Constitution, we are fully convinced. A "bill," within the contemplation of the Constitution, means a draft of a proposed law, and nothing else. After a bill has been introduced in one house, and an amendment which changes one or more of its original features or adds new features is adopted by such house, the amendment then enters into and becomes a part of the bill or draft of the proposed law, and is as much a part of the bill as if it had been incorporated in the draft of the proposed law before it was introduced into such house. The Constitution provides (art. 3, § 15) that "no law shall be passed except by bill," and further says: "Nor shall any bill become a law unless the same shall have been read on three several days in each house previous to the final vote thereon." Ibid. The term as here used is generic, and means not only the draft of the proposed law as originally introduced, but such draft with all of the graftings which may be made thereon. In other words it means the full draft of the law which the legislature passes. It is argued that the procedure prescribed by the Constitution is burdensome, and will seriously impede legislation. If we admit this to be true, the answer is that the remedy is in a change of the Constitution, not in violations of its mandates. The court did not make, nor can it change, the provisions of the Constitution. We are asked to give our assent to the act in question, and pronounce it valid, when it was unquestionably passed, not in the manner required, but in a manner forbidden, by the Constitution. We cannot do so, and, should we do so, it would be an attempt on the part of one branch of the government to modify the provisions of the Constitution and usurp a power which beong to, and can only be exercised by, the people in their sovereign capacity. The object of these provisions is twofold: First, to insure against hasty and inconsiderate legislation, by giving the opportunity to each member of the legislature to familiarize himself with all of the provisions of every proposed law, and afford sufficient time for reflection as to the effect and consequences of the enactment of any proposed law; second, to give the people the opportunity of learning what is being done or proposed to be done by their legislature, thus affording them opportunity to remonstrate against the passage of any proposed law which they might regard as detrimental or obnoxious. These objects are thwarted and wholly defeated if amendments are not treated as parts of the bill, and read three times on several days, and read section by section on final passage, and then passed by an aye and nay vote. If, under the guise of an amendment, a proposed law which has never been read in both houses is permitted to have the sanctity of law, the provisions of the Constitution amount to nothing, and the will of the people may be ignored, and the object of the provisions entirely defeated. More than this, the floodgates of fraud would be thrown wide open, as to the enactment of laws, and the people would be without remedy. To show how easily this could be done, just suppose that one senator and one representative desire to pass a certain measure which they know will be obnoxious to the people; that, by agreement they should draft a bill which is entirely different in intent and effect from the one which they desire passed; that it is introduced into the senate, and perchance known as "Senate Bill No. 2," where it is read on three several days, and properly passed on an aye and nay vote; that it is then sent to the other house, where it is read on three several days, when the member who is in collusion with the senator who introduced it in the senate offers his amendment, which the house adopts, and which changes the entire object, scope, and effect of the proposed law, and which, although relating to the same subject and the same title, is in fact a new and different bill from the one introduced in the senate; that this new bill, called an "amendment," is then printed and passed by the house without being read but one time; that the house then sends a message to the senate saying that "the house has passed senate bill No. 2 as amended;" and that thereupon a senator "moves that the senate concur in the house amendments to senate bill No. 2," which motion should be declared passed without the amendment having been read or voted on by an aye and nay vote in the senate. Would this not be "whipping the devil around the stump," and doing indirectly what the Constitution directly forbids? Yet this was done in the case at bar, in violation of all established law, and in contravention of the provisions of the Constitution.

In this connection, and in approval of what is therein said, we will quote extensively from the decision of the Kentucky court of appeals in Norman v. Kentucky Bd. of Mgrs. of World's Columbian Exposition, 93 Ky. 537, 18 L. R. A. 556, as follows: "Section 46 of our Constitution provides: 'No bill shall become a law, unless on its final passage it receives the votes of at least two fifths of the members elected to each house, and a majority of the members voting, the vote to be taken by yeas and nays, and entered in the journal: provided, any act or resolution for the appropriation of money or the creation of debt shall, on its final passage, receive the votes of a majority of all the members elected to each house.' The act originated in senate, and passed that body, upon a yea and nay vote, entered upon its journal, by the required majority. It then went to the other house, where, after being amended, it passed, upon a like vote, entered upon its journal by a like majority. It then came back to the senate, where the amendments were concurred in without a yea and nay vote, and without the vote of a majority of the members elected. It is conceded by the counsel for the appellees, and seems plain, that this mode of proceeding did not conform to the Constitution. It complied with it in neither letter nor spirit. The object of the section above cited was to have the assent of a majority of all of the members elected to each house to all the provisions of the act, and that this should appear by a yea and nay vote entered upon its journal. If a bill, after passing one house in the proper manner, and then, after amendment, passing the other house in like manner, could come back to the house in which it originated, and be adopted by a majority of those voting, or a quorum, it would defeat this object, and render the section ineffectual. Let us look at it practically. An appropriation bill of $100 originates in the senate, and is properly passed. It goes to the house, where it is amended by making the sum $10,000, and is then properly passed by it. It returns to the senate for concurrence, and is adopted, as amended, by a majority of those present, without a yea and nay vote. Can it be well contended that this would be a compliance with the Constitution? If so, then, there being thirty-eight senators, it would require twenty, or a majority of them to pass a bill for a trifle, but, after being amended in the house so as to perhaps bankrupt the treasury, it could be concurred in by the senate by the votes of eleven members, or a majority of a quorum; and in case of the house with its 100 members, it would require 51 to pass the bill, if it originated there, but only twenty-six, or a majority of a quorum, to concur in it after it had been changed in like manner by the senate. Further illustration seems needless. It is true, it has been held that the 'final passage' of a bill means when it first passes the body, and not when it returns to it, after amendment, for adoption; and it is said that the constitutional provision as to the number of votes, and the entry of the yea and nay vote on the journal, does not apply to amendments, or the reports of conference committees. If so, then no matter how material the change, a majority vote of a quorum may pass the bill. The words 'final passage,' as used in our Constitution, mean final passage. They do not mean some passage before the final one, but the last one. They do not mean the passage of a part of a bill, or what is first introduced, and which may, by reason of amendment, become the least important. If so, then the body may pass what is practically a new bill in a manner counter to both the letter and spirit of the Constitution. When the bill was voted on in the senate, as amended, and after its return from the house, there never was any further action by the senate. It was the final vote, and therefore its final passage; and being so, a majority vote of all the members elected, with an entry by yea and nay vote upon the journal, was necessary to its constitutional enactment. The bill, as approved by the speakers of the two houses and the governor, never was passed by the senate, by a majority of all of its members, nor by a yea and nay vote. It is said, however, upon the one side, that, having been enrolled, signed by the presiding officer of each house, and approved by the governor, the act must be conclusively presumed to have been constitutionally enacted; that public policy requires this rule, else confusion will result, by our statute law being reduced from a state of certainty to one of doubt. Upon the other side, it is urged, with equal ability, that a prima facie case only is thereby presented, and that resort may be had to the journals of the legislature, which are required by the Constitution to be kept, and are kept, under the supervision of all the members, as to the truth of the matter. Each position is supported by numerous authorities, and, whether the one rule or the other obtains, more or less abuse and danger may result. There is some dynamite either way, but perhaps not as much in the latter as some apprehend, as the party questioning the enrolled and approved act must at the outset overcome a prima facie case. The first view is the English one, where there is no written constitution. It has been followed by our supreme court [U. S.] and by at least nine of the supreme courts of the states. The weight of authority in this country, as declared in perhaps as many as nineteen states, is, however, the other way."

Since the rendition of the opinion supra the court of appeals of Kentucky have held, in Lafferty v. Huffman, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 19, 82 L. R. A. 208, that a bill which has been properly enrolled, signed by the presiding officer of each house, and approved by the governor, cannot be impeached by reference to the journals of either house to show the mode of its enactment. The latter decision was followed by the same court in two later cases, Com. v. Shelton, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 80, and Com. v. Hardin County Ct. reported in 18 Ky. L. Rep. 118. Whether this change in the opinion of that eminent court was caused through fear of appearing guilty of indelicacy and disrespect towards a co-ordinate branch of government, or through fear that the rules enunciated in Norman v. Kentucky Bd. of Mgrs. of World's Columbian Exposition would entail upon the court considerable labor which otherwise would not devolve upon it, or other grave reason, we are at a loss to determine. But the doctrine announced in Lafferty v. Huffman simply places it in the power of the legislature to violate the provisions of the Kentucky Constitution in regard to the passage of bills. Look at it practically, taking our illustration from the decision in Norman v. Kentucky Bd. of Mgrs. of World's Columbian Exposition, 93 Ky. 587, 18 L. R. A. 556. A bill originates in the senate, appropriating $100, and properly passes the senate. It then goes to the house, where it is amended by making the sum $10,000, and is then properly passed by the house. It then returns to the senate for concurrence, and is adopted by the senate without the yea and nay vote required by the Constitution, and by a majority vote of those present, but less than a majority of all the members elected to the senate. By the Kentucky Constitution this appropriation bill could not be law, for the reason that it did not receive a majority of the votes of all the members elected to the senate, voting by ayes and nays entered on the journal. The language of the Kentucky Constitution is prohibitory,—“No bill shall become a law unless,” etc., and, in the language of Mr. Black, “is to be understood as intended to be a positive and unequivocal negation.” The bill is pronounced by the Constitution to be “no law,” yet the court, by adopting the convenient rule that it will not go back of the enrolled bill, but presume, from the fact that the bill was signed by the presiding officers of both houses and approved by the governor, that all of the requirements of the Constitution relating to the passage of bills were complied with by the legislature, substituting fiction for fact, and recognizing said act as valid, simply nullifies the provisions of the Constitution relating to the passage of bills. More than that; the court pronounces that to be law which the Constitution says is not, and shall not be, law; thus making that which is void valid, and infusing life into that which never before had life. In such case it would be pertinent to inquire who made the act appropriating this $10,000. The legislature did not, because a majority of all the members elected to the senate did not assent thereto on an aye and nay vote, for which reason the Constitution declares it shall not be law. But the court, by recognizing it as law, gives it the effect and force of law. This, in our opinion, encroaches upon the constitutional rights which the people have reserved, and invades the realm of the lawmaking branch of the government. It is not the province of the court to make law. But when a court, in effect, nullifies provisions in a Constitution, and recognizes statutes which are declared to be void by the Constitution as valid, it is simply making law. That eminent patriot and statesman, Thomas Jefferson, entertained grave fears lest the republic should be undermined and destroyed by encroachments on the part of the courts upon the constitutional rights of the people. Neither branch of government must encroach upon the constitutional rights of the people. The people of this state have reserved to themselves the constitutional right to have all of their laws made in a certain mode, and have withheld from the legislature the power to make laws in any other mode. Shall the legislature and the judiciary connive together to overthrow this constitutional right? Do the obligations of the official oath rest so lightly upon judicial officers that they may obey those obligations or not, support the Constitution or not, as they may deem expedient or inexpedient? May they enforce the fundamental law or refuse to do so at pleasure? If so, then constitutional government is in the last stages of dissolution.

and the people have no constitutional rights which must necessarily be respected.

Respondent, in the petition for rehearing, says: “Can it be said that § 15 of art. 8 of our Constitution requires each amendment to a bill to be printed, or to be read on three several days? If such are the intent and purpose of the Constitution, one member in either house can obstruct all legislation by simply offering amendments thereto. If all amendments, however numerous, are required to be printed, and read on three several days after printing, it would cause untold delay.” To this we answer: The offering of an amendment or proposition to change a bill is not an amendment and does not become such until the house in which it is offered accepts or adopts it. Then, under the express commands of the Constitution, an amendment which has been offered and accepted, and thus enters into and becomes a part of the bill, must be printed, and the whole bill, not a part of it, must be read on three several days, unless, owing to the existence of an urgency, the three readings on several days be dispensed with by two thirds of the house on an aye and nay vote entered in the journal. The presumption is that no member of either house will offer amendments merely for the purpose of delay. And if an amendment is offered to a meritorious bill which is pending in either house, merely for delay, the house presumably will reject it, or should do so. But, if an amendment is offered which possesses merit, then the house in which it is offered should, in the interests of the people, and acting in the line of official duty, accept it, have it printed, and give it that mature and deliberate consideration which the Constitution clearly intended should be given to all bills and to all parts of every bill. The position of respondent is absurd, and the argument advanced in this particular is without merit.

Respondent contends that it is not necessary for the journals to show anything except what the Constitution expressly says must be entered upon the journals. This would dispense entirely with the office of the journal, and limit the entries therein to a record of the vote upon the expulsion of a member and on final passage of bills. The idea is not in accord with the spirit, and is opposed to the letter, of our Constitution.

Respondent also contends that, except as to the entry of the vote on final passage and the vote on expulsion of a member, it is unnecessary to enter any vote in the journal unless demanded by three members under § 13, art. 8, of the Constitution. It is the settled rule in nearly all of the courts that when an aye and nay vote is required by the Constitution an entry of such vote must appear in the journal. Our Constitution says that the reading on three several days cannot be dispensed with unless two thirds of the house, “voting by yeas and nays,” should, in case of urgency, dispense with this provision. This means that such vote shall be entered on the journal. Under § 13, three members, when they desire it, may have the vote on any motion, committee report, or any other question taken by yeas and nays, and entered in the journal. But the vote on final passage of any bill, or on a suspension of the provision which requires the reading of bills on three several days, or on the expulsion of a member, must, whether demanded by three members or not, be by yeas and nays, and entered in the journal.

Respondent contends that some reliance and confidence must be bestowed upon the proceedings of the legislature. This is true, and clearly intended by our Constitution. The legislature is required to keep a record of its proceedings. Courts must rely upon that record, and presume it to be absolutely correct, and refuse to permit it to be contradicted. The Constitution points out the mode in which all laws shall be passed, and requires the legislature to furnish through its journals the evidence showing the mode in which it passed every bill. By the evidence thus furnished by the legislature it must affirmatively appear that any act, when questioned, was passed by the legislature in that mode only authorized by the Constitution. The object of the journals, principally, is to enable the people to ascertain that any and all laws were enacted in the manner required by the Constitution, so as to determine whether such was constitutionally passed, and therefore valid and binding. If we refuse to go back of the enrolled bill,—close our eyes and ears to the evidence which the legislature furnishes, and is required by the Constitution to furnish,—the object of these constitutional provisions may be wholly defeated.

It has been said that the decision in this case abrogates the principle of majority rule. Does it? The people adopted the Constitution, and have expressed in it the will of the majority as to the manner in which laws shall be enacted. Shall forty-nine members or any part thereof, in one house, or twenty-one members, or any portion thereof, in the other house, be permitted to enact a law in any other manner? If so, the will of the people is set at naught and the will of a small number of individuals substituted for the will of the great majority. The creature must not be regarded as greater than the creator. Each of the three coordinate branches of our government is the creature of the Constitution, subject and necessarily subordinate, thereto. In construing constitutional provisions, certain fixed and absolute rules, which the court cannot disregard, must be observed, viz.: The words of the instrument are to control. The intent of the people in adopting it is to govern. The intent of the people is to be found in the words used. The whole instrument must be examined. Words are not to be regarded as used without occasion. The words used are to be considered with reference to their usual signification. Effect must be given to the whole instrument, etc. It is needless to use further illustrations or cite additional authorities. After another full and careful consideration of this case in all its bearings, I see no reason for changing our views concerning the questions involved.

A rehearing is denied.

Quarles, J., concurring:

I concur with the views expressed in the opinion of Mr. Justice Huston in this case. His conclusions and the reasons given therefor, I regard as being in perfect harmony with the letter and spirit of our Constitution. Mr. Chief Justice Sullivan, while concurring with the conclusion reached in this case, does not agree with the majority opinion on two points which I will briefly discuss.

First, that the legislative journals must affirmatively show a compliance with the requirements of the Constitution in the passage of a bill, the validity of which is questioned. Upon this point we are cited to a number of authorities, and furnished with a number of quotations. But a careful study of the authorities cited is all that is needed to show that the rule therein announced is based merely upon precedent,—because some court has so decided,—and not upon reason and common sense, the basis and foundation of all law. The careful and painstaking student finds many inconsistencies in the authorities touching constitutional questions. A careful study of the adjudicated cases leads to the conclusion that both the legislative and judicial departments of government of several of our states have chafed under the limitations and restrictions imposed by constitutions, and that they have at times done indirectly what the Constitution directly forbids. In one case cited by Mr. Chief Justice Sullivan the Constitution prohibited the introduction of any bill after the fiftieth day. A bill to incorporate a township had been introduced in due season, but after the fiftieth day a substitute for this bill, incorporating a city outside of the limits of the proposed township was introduced and adopted. The title and subject-matter of the original bill were entirely changed, and in lieu thereof a new title and a new proposition or subject-matter was substituted. The substitute bill passed, and was approved by the governor. The court held the act valid. In another case which he cites from the same court a bill to incorporate a township had been introduced before the fiftieth day, but after the fiftieth day a substitute for such bill, for the purpose of incorporating a county out of the same territory, was introduced, adopted, and passed. The court held this bill valid. It is apparent that the object of said provision was to prevent the introduction and "rail-roading" of bills through the legislature during the last days of its session, and that the legislature should have the last ten days of its session to devote to those propositions which had been submitted to it prior to the fifty-first day of its session. But in both of these cases the object of the provision was wholly defeated, and the legislature, under the guise of amendment or substitute, did indirectly what was expressly prohibited by the Constitution. The object and purpose of creating a city, a township, or precinct, and a county, as well as the powers exercised by each, are so entirely different that it is difficult to see how the court held the amendment or substitute in either of these cases germane to the original bill. In the first case it is easy to see that the entire population of the county might be heartily in favor of creating the proposed township. It is easily conceived that the people of the county might have been opposed to creating the new city, and perhaps a good majority of the residents of the new city were opposed to the incorporation of it; and it requires no great stretch of imagination to surmise that in the last case the great majority of the people of the old county were opposed to any division of such county, or the creation of a new county out of part of their territory. Perchance, in both cases, the people immediately interested, after carefully watching the proceedings of the legislature to see if any proposition affecting their local government and interests, to which they were opposed, should be introduced into their legislature, at the end of the fiftieth day saw that none had been introduced, and relying upon the aforesaid provision in their Constitution, and believing that no such proposition could thereafter be proposed, ceased their vigilance, and quit watching the proceedings of their legislature. The existence of such conditions is suggested by the fact that the proposition to create the city in the one case, and the new county in the other, came in under mask, and not openly and in the usual way. It was doubtless through such apparent violations of plain constitutional provisions that Judge Cooley was induced to comment upon such frauds by giving the illustrations of substituting, by amendment, for the proposition to incorporate the city of Siam, the proposition to dam the Wild Cat river, so aptly quoted by Mr. Justice Huston. The lessons to be learned in these two cases show the wisdom of obeying the Constitution in letter and spirit, the necessity of refusing to recognize as law any act which is expressly prohibited by the Constitution, whether passed directly and above board, or passed indirectly, under cloak, or the habilliment of fraud, and show the ease with which the plain provisions of the supreme law of the land can be evaded and effectually defeated by the joint action of the legislature and the courts. Now, courts do not make, but must obey and enforce, the law. In our Constitution we find the supreme standard by which all statutory enactments are to be measured and judged. If, in a given case, the court must and does apply this standard, and finds that the statute falls short of the required measure, the court's duty is plain. In such case the court has no discretion, but must follow the Constitution, or else, as was said by Judge Cooley, be guilty of "a violation of official oath and public duty." If courts, through fear of appearing indelicate, recognize acts which are prohibited by the fundamental law, when such acts are indirectly committed, they are not discouraging, but encouraging, fraud, and are not closing the gates to fraud, but opening them and inviting entrance thereto.

As evidence of the inconsistencies of writers upon constitutional law, read the quotations from Mr. Sutherland, Judge Cooley, and Mr. Black given by my associates in this case. Then carefully study all of the authorities cited. How, then, are we to determine whether a bill becomes a law or not? In my opinion there is but one way to ascertain, and that is to look to the journals to see if the legislature has done those things commanded by the Constitution. The object of requiring the legislature to keep a journal of its proceedings, in my opinion, is that the people, from whom all power comes, may have positive and permanent record evidence as to what has become law and what has not. Under this view it becomes absolutely necessary that the journals show that the steps expressly commanded by the Constitution in the passage of a bill were taken. I confess it is embarrassing for a court to take this position. To avoid such embarrassment, for reasons of expediency, and on account of a so-called public policy, some of the courts have adopted the view of Mr. Chief Justice Sullivan,—that, in order to hold a statute void for the reason that it was not passed in the mode required by the Constitution, it must affirmatively appear by the journals that some constitutional requirement was not obeyed, and that the silence of the journal as to whether a requirement was obeyed or not is not sufficient to authorize the court to hold that such requirement was not obeyed. This proposition involves the absurd anomaly of requiring the plaintiff to prove a negative, and to prove it by a dumb witness,—one who does not speak, but is silent upon the question at issue. We will illustrate the absurdity of the proposition by supposing the following case, to wit: A bill is introduced into the senate, and read one time. When the second reading of bills is reached the next day, this bill, owing entirely to oversight, is overlooked, and not read the second time. Under these circumstances, the senate journal is silent as to the second reading, and does not say whether it was read the second time or not. Afterwards what should have been the third reading occurs, and the journal so shows. The bill passes both houses, and is signed and approved. Now, bear in mind that the bill was not read three times in the senate, but only twice. The journals show what was done, but do not show what was not done. By the express terms of the Constitution, this bill is not law, because it was not read three times by each house of the legislature. Now, applying the doctrine of presumption contended for by Chief Justice Sullivan, that because the journal does not say in so many words "this bill was not read three times," the court must, by presumption, supply the second reading, and thus make a law which the legislature did not, according to the Constitution, make, and you effectually eliminate this provision from the Constitution. If the court can read the bill for the legislature one time, it may do so two, or even three times. If the journal need not necessarily show anything in regard to the passage of a bill except the final vote thereon, then the legislature may fail to read a bill at all, and by refusing to say anything about the reading of it the court must say that it was read three times, because the journal does not expressly say that "this bill was not read three times." The idea is monstrous, and the danger of such a rule is fully apparent, and its adoption would be tantamount to a refusal to obey and support the Constitution.

The functions of the legislature consist exclusively in making laws, with but few exceptions. Then why command it, in the supreme law of the land, to "keep a journal of its proceedings," unless the journal is to show what bills have been enacted into law? Mr. Chief Justice Sullivan says in his opinion that the first clause of § 18, art. 8, of the Constitution, "commands the legislature to keep a full and complete journal of its proceedings." This is undoubtedly true, and it is apparent that the object of this provision is to make the legislature show what it has done, leaving nothing whatever to implication. And, when the legislature says what it has done with regard to the passage of any bill, it negatives the idea that it has done anything else in regard thereto. Silence proves nothing where one is commanded to speak. But in such case the refusal of the witness to say that he did that which he should have done would justify the presumption that he did not do it. Our Constitution commands certain things to be done in regard to the passage of a bill, and says that no bill shall become a law unless these things are done. It seems a travesty upon our supreme law to say that it guarantees to the people the right to have their laws made in this manner only, and that there is no way of enforcing this right, or for the court to say that this is law when the Constitution says it is not law. There is one safe course which is in harmony with the Constitution, and that is to adhere to the rule that the legislature must show, as commanded by the Constitution, that it has done everything required by the Constitution to be done in the serious and important matter of making laws. This is the rule of evidence provided by the Constitution. It is not presumptuous in the courts, nor disrespectful to the legislature, to judge the acts of the legislature by its own evidence; and, as said by Mr. Chief Justice Sullivan in his opinion herein: "The commands found in §§ 13-15, art. 3, of the Constitution of this state, are directed to the members of the legislature, and their oaths of office require them to see to it that the provisions of these sections are conscientiously complied with." The only difference between us is that he thinks that, in courtesy to the legislative department, the judiciary should, by presumption, supply its omissions, while I cannot think so. To deal fairly with the legislature, and at the same time support the Constitution in letter and intent, we should judge the acts of the legislature by its own evidence, —neither adding anything thereto nor taking anything therefrom. It is not presumptuous, indelicate, or disrespectful for the court to say: "We presume that the legislature obeyed the obligations of the official oath, and recorded in its journal every step taken by it in the passage of this bill. And because the journals do not show that this bill was read the second time in the senate, or that such reading was, on account of urgency, dispensed with by two-thirds of the senate on an aye and nay vote, we presume that the second reading was inadvertently overlooked in the senate, and did not occur. And, because this bill was not read three times in each house, the Constitution says it is not law, and we cannot recognize it as law." This is, to my mind, the only safe and correct rule. It imposes no duty not enjoined by the Constitution, and works no hardship. Its observance simply carries out the provisions of the Constitution, in letter and spirit, preserves the constitutional right of the people to have their laws made in a careful and considerate manner, and properly respects the integrity of the legislative department. But violations of the express mandates of the Constitution by the legislature whether occurring through inadvertence or otherwise, cannot be tolerated. To prevent fraud, and to avoid the probable error of the court adjudging an act passed by the legislature to be law which by the Constitution is not law, the court is compelled to adopt the rule that the journals of the legislature must affirmatively show that the express requirements of the Constitution were complied with in the enactment of any law which is attacked on the ground that it was not passed in the manner required by the Constitution. The journal is read in each house daily, and it is proper to conclude that the members and officers will see that it is correct. In fact, the journal is kept under the immediate supervision of each member. It is no great burden for the members to see that bills are reported, printed, read three times, and passed by an aye and nay vote, and that these steps are shown by the journals. The Constitution requires it, and, being so required, courts should take the journals for what they say, and regard them as telling "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." We do not impugn the integrity of the legislature. We think the fault lies principally in the fact that the legislature has followed the procedure of its territorial predecessors and that of our national Congress, inadvertently overlooking the fact that our state Constitution imposes limitations and restrictions upon the legislature which were not imposed upon the territorial legislature or upon Congress, there being no provision in the Federal Constitution requiring Congress to read all bills three times, etc.

Our views of the good faith and integrity of the legislature can best be expressed by quoting the language of the supreme court of the state of California in the case of Weill v. Kenfield, 54 Cal. 111, as follows: "To our respect for a co-ordinate department of the state government is added our personal regard for the distinguished gentlemen who have so ably presented the view of this case from which we have felt constrained to dissent. We might freely admit that none of the restrictions of the Constitution would be necessary to the proper discharge of their duties by the honorable gentlemen who compose the present assembly. But the people may not always be so happy in the choice of their representatives, and we deem it our duty to require a strict compliance with mandatory provisions intended to prevent evils which have exercised in the past, and which may reappear in the future." The doctrine of presumption, as applied by Chief Justice Sullivan to the passage of bills, originated in England, where they have no written Constitution. The English rule stops all inquiry at the enrolled bill, while the rule contended for by Mr. Chief Justice Sullivan permits the court to go back of the enrolled bill to the journal, to see if it passed by the required aye and nay vote, supplying everything else that the journal is silent about. The rule for which he contends is the English rule with a slight modification. If the court is to supply the principal part of the evidence by presumption, it would be more consistent to supply it all, and refuse to go back of the enrolled bill. In Weill v. Kenfield, 54 Cal. 111, the supreme court of California, in discussing the question under consideration says: "It was intended by and declared in the clause so often referred to, that the reading of a bill shall no longer be implied from the mere silence of senators or assemblymen, but that the consent of the house in which the bill is pending, to a waiver of the actual reading, shall be indicated only by a formal vote of 'yeas and nays,' when two thirds shall declare that an 'urgency' has arisen which renders it proper to dispense with the reading. The vote upon dispensing with the reading goes upon the record, so that each representative may be held responsible to his constituents for his conduct in respect to this as well as other questions. The entry must now accord with the fact. It is not to be entered in the journal (as was often formerly the case), that a bill is read when it is not read. It must either be read, or the members be called on to declare affirmatively that it shall not be read, because of pressing and urgent necessity. We do not dare to determine that any constitutional prerequisite to the validity of a law is of no practical service. It may be, as suggested, that the evil effects of the delays caused by the interpretation of the language of the Constitution we have adopted may more than counterbalance any benefits that may accrue to legislation by the additional opportunities afforded each lawmaker to become acquainted with the contents of all bills. But we are not permitted to consider the policy of a provision, where its language, as in the present instance, seems to us plain and positive. The whole of this line of argument is disposed of by the phrase, Iulex scripta est." In People, Barnes, v. Sterne, 35 Ill. 121, 85 Am. Dec. 348, the supreme court of Illinois uses this language: "Were it not for the somewhat peculiar provision of our Constitution, which requires that all bills, before they can become laws, shall be read three several times in each house, and shall be passed by a vote of a majority of all the members elect, a bill thus signed and approved would be conclusive of its validity and binding force as a law. But this provision having been adopted, to prevent improvident legislation, and to prevent the enforcement of bills that were never enacted into laws, the means for its enforcement are implied. It is true that these means are negative and not positive in their character. Whilst neither of the other co-ordinate branches of the government have authority to command its observance, the judicial and executive departments are not bound to enforce such bills as laws. Whilst they are prima facie binding, still, when it appears from the journals that either of these constitutional requirements is wanting, the provisions of the bill will not be enforced. According to the theory of our legislation, when a bill has become a law, there must be record evidence of every material requirement, from its introduction until it becomes a law. And this evidence is found upon the journals of the two houses." In the last two sentences the learned Illinois court simply expresses in other words the rule announced in the original opinion in this case, viz., that the journals must affirmatively show that the requirements of the Constitution were complied with by the legislature in the passage of a bill the validity of which is questioned. With all due deference to Judge

Harlan, for whose learning and eminent ability I have the profoundest respect, I must say that his interpretation of the above language of the supreme court of Illinois seems strained and unauthorized. The same learned court in Ryan v. Lynch, 68 Ill. 160, held that the certificate of the secretary of state, giving "full and true copies of the journals of the senate and house of representatives, so far as the same relate to the passage of the bill," was competent evidence to prove "the nonexistence of any particular fact." The nonexistence of the fact is shown by presenting the journal, or full copies thereof, from which it appears that certain steps were not shown. The journal showed what facts existed. It should have shown other facts. Its failure to do so proved nonexistence.

Touching the second point discussed by Mr. Chief Justice Sullivan, I shall content myself with saying that Mr. Sutherland cites as sustaining the rule that amendments need not be read three times only three cases, to wit: Miller v. State, 3 Ohio St. 475; People, Beardsley, v. Wallace, 70 Ill. 680; State, Atty. Gen., v. Platt, 2 S. C. N. S. 150, 16 Am. Rep. 647. The two last-named cases merely mention the rule, and do not attempt to give any reason whatever in support of it. And in the Ohio case, after saying that "It is not unusual in parliamentary proceedings, to amend a bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting a new bill," the court proceeds to say: "When the subject or proposition of the bill is thereby wholly changed, it would seem to be proper to read the amended bill three times, and on different days, but when there is no such vital alteration three readings of the amendment are not required." Notice that the vital alteration consisted in wholly changing the subject or proposition of the bill. Did the learned court mean to convey the idea that, if some part of the subject or proposition remained,—a one-hundredth part, for instance,—it was not necessary to read the amendment, although it should wholly change ninety-nine hundredths of it? Such a rule is not based upon reason. The reasoning on this point in the opinion of Mr. Justice Huston herein is so clear and consonant with common sense, and so apparently in harmony with the evident intent of our Constitution, that I accept it fully, and refuse to blindly follow a small number of precedents that are not based upon reason and common sense, but opposed to the letter and intent of our Constitution. For the reason that it is the unanimous opinion of the court that the act in question is void, a rehearing is properly denied.

Sullivan, Ch. J., dissenting:

I think the original opinion in this case should be modified upon two points, at least: First, wherein it holds that the journals must affirmatively show that each and every requirement of the Constitution has been complied with in the passage of a bill; second, wherein it holds that the constitutional provisions require bills to be read on three several days in each house before the final vote thereon.

As to the first point: Section 18, art. 3, of the Constitution of this state is as follows: "Each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings; and the yeas and nays of the members of either house on any question shall at the request of any three members present be entered on the journal." In the opinion it is held that the meaning of the first clause of said section is that the journal must show all of the proceedings of the house and all of the steps taken in the passage of a bill. While that may be true, I do not think the silence of the journal as to some of the proceedings required by the Constitution to pass a bill should be held conclusive evidence, or any evidence, to show that such bill was not regularly passed. The last clause of said section refers to and commands the entry on the journal of the yeas and nays on any question when requested by three members. Voting is a proceeding required in the passage of motions, resolutions, etc. And, if it was intended by the framers of the Constitution that the first clause of said section was mandatory as to every act and proceeding of either house, what was the necessity for the last clause of said section? If the first clause absolutely required the entry on the journals of the yeas and nays whenever a vote was so taken, the last clause of said section adds nothing thereto, and was a work of supererogation. I am of the opinion that it was not intended by the first clause of said section to have all laws held invalid where the journals failed to show that each and every step required by the Constitution in the passage of a bill had not been taken. Said section clearly intimates, to my mind, that in the passage of motions, resolutions, etc., when a yea and nay vote is taken, it need not be entered on the journal, unless requested by three members, although said section requires each house to keep a record of its proceedings. Section 15 of said article 8 provides, among other things, that on the final passage of a bill the vote shall be by yeas and nays, and entered upon the journal. Why provide in said section 15 that such yea and nay vote shall be entered on the journal, if such act was commanded by the first clause of § 13 of said article 8? Thus it is shown that the framers of the Constitution, after directing each house to keep a journal of its proceedings, expressly and specifically commands that the yea and nay vote on any question must be entered on the journal on the request of three members, and also commands that on the final passage of any bill the vote must be by yeas and nays, and entered on the journal. I find no provision in the Constitution that expressly requires either house to enter on its journal the fact that a bill was printed, or that it was read on three several days, before being placed on its final passage. The rule for which I contend has obtained in the state of Illinois, and many other states of this Union, for many years, and not a single instance has been called to my attention where a legislature has resorted to the means suggested by my associates in the enactment of laws in violation of said provisions of the Constitution.

In Miller v. State, 3 Ohio St. 475, Chief Justice Thurman, speaking for the court, said: "Thus we find, inter alia, the provision before quoted, 'that every bill shall be fully and distinctly read on three different days, unless, in case of urgency, three fourths of the house in which it shall be pending shall dispense with this rule.' This is an important provision, without doubt, but nevertheless, there is much reason for saying that it is merely directory in its character, and that its observance by the assembly is secured by their sense of duty and official oaths, and not by any supervisory power of the courts. Any other construction, we incline to think, would lead to very absurd and alarming consequences." It is said by Mr. Sutherland in his work on Statutory Construction (p. 48): "Journals are records, and in all respects touching proceedings under the mandatory provisions of the Constitution will be effectual to impeach and avoid the acts recorded as law and duly authenticated, if the journals affirmatively show that these provisions have been disregarded. In the absence of such an affirmative showing, and even in cases of doubt, it will be presumed that a quorum was present; that the necessary readings occurred; that amendments made by one branch, though extensive, were germane; that they were concurred in by the other branch, though the journals may be silent." Touching the question under consideration, it is stated in Black on Constitutional Law (p. 297) as follows: "But if the journal entries are ambiguous, or if they fail to show facts which the Constitution does not expressly require them to show, this will not raise any presumption against the validity of the action of the legislature. On the contrary, the courts will presume that the legislature fully complied with the constitutional requirements, although the journals do not show the fact." In Illinois v. Illinois C. R. Co. 88 Fed. Rep. 730, under constitutional provisions like our own in regard to reading a bill upon three different days, it is held that the failure of the journal of the senate to show compliance therewith will not invalidate the bill or act. The case is from the United States circuit court in and for the northern district of Illinois, and the opinion is by Mr. Justice Harlan, of the Supreme Court of the United States, who presides in the seventh circuit. In that case it was contended that the general assembly, in passing the act under consideration in that case, did not meet the requirements of the Constitution in that the journals fail to show that the bill was read on three different days in each house. Nothing appeared in the senate journal to show that the bill had been read a second time in that body, and after stating the facts, Mr. Justice Harlan states that the question for determination was, "Is it essential to its [the bill's] validity that it should appear in the journal that the bill was 'read on three different days in each house?' Does the mere silence of the senate journal as to whether the bill was in fact read a second time in that body, on some one of the three different days, raise a conclusive presumption that it was not so read?" The learned justice then calls attention to the fact that counsel, to support the proposition that the mere silence of the journal as to whether a bill was read on three different days was fatal to the validity of the act, cites Spangler v. Jacoby, 14 Ill. 297, 58 Am. Dec. 571, in which that court said: "In our opinion, it is clearly competent to show from the journals of either branch of the legislature, that a particular act was not passed in the mode prescribed by the Constitution, and thus defeat its operation altogether. The Constitution requires each house to keep a journal, and declares that certain facts, made essential to the passage of a law, shall be stated therein. If those facts are not set forth, the conclusion is that they did not transpire. The journal is made up under the immediate direction of the house, and is presumed to contain a full and complete history of its proceedings. If a certain act received the constitutional assent of the body, it will so appear on the face of its journal. And when a contest arises as to whether the act was thus passed, the journal may be appealed to to settle it. It is the evidence of the action of the house, and by it the act must stand or fall. It certainly was not the intention of the framers of the Constitution that the signatures of the speakers and the executive should furnish conclusive evidence of the passage of a law. The presumption indeed is, that an act thus verified, became a law pursuant to the requirements of the Constitution, but that presumption may be overthrown. If the journal is lost or destroyed, this presumption will sustain the law, for it will be intended that the proper entry was made in the journal. But when the journal is in existence, and it fails to show that the act was passed in the mode prescribed by the Constitution, the presumption is overcome, and the act must fall." In commenting upon that quotation the learned justice said: "But we are not satisfied that the court intended to express an opinion upon that precise point [the point as to the silence of the journal as to the second reading of the bill]. Although it did not appear, in that case, that the bill was read the third time before it went to the senate, or that the ayes and noes were called, no special comment was made by the court upon the silence of the journal as to the bill not being read the third time. Plainly, its language had reference to the fact that the journal did not show the passage (final) of the bill by ayes and noes. It was with reference to that fact that the language above quoted was used." Justice Harlan in that case also comments upon the case of Turley v. Logan County, 17 Ill. 152. He quotes the following therefrom, to wit, "The journals should show the readings, and the passage of the law by a constitutional vote," and says: "But nothing was said as to what would be the result where the journal did not show that each of the required readings was had." And further on he says: "That we do not misinterpret these decisions is shown in Schuyler County Supers. v. People, Rock Island & A. R. Co. 25 Ill. 188, where one of the grounds of objection to an act was that the senate journal did not show that the bill was read three times before it was put on its final passage. The court said: 'The Constitution does require that every bill shall be read three times in each branch of the general assembly before it shall be passed into a law,' but the Constitution does not say that three several readings shall be entered on the journals. Some acts performed in the passage of laws are required by the Constitution to be entered on the journals, in order to make them valid, and among these are the entries of the ayes and nays on the final passage of every bill, and we held in the case of Spangler v. Jacoby, 14 Ill. 297, 58 Am. Dec. 571, that where the journal did not show this, the act never became a law. But, where the Constitution is silent as to whether a particular act which is required to be performed shall be entered on the journals, it is then left to the discretion of either house to enter it or not, and the silence of the journal on the subject ought not to be held to afford evidence that the act was not done. In such a case we must presume it was done, unless the journal affirmatively shows that it was not done." After using the language above quoted it is said: "This decision was expressly reaffirmed in Wabash R. Co. v. Hughes, 38 Ill. 186. Nothing to the contrary was decided in People, Barnes, v. Starnes, 35 Ill. 141, 85 Am. Dec. 348, or in Ryan v. Lynch, 68 Ill. 161, which is relied upon as modifying or overruling Schuyler County Supers. v. People, Rock Island & A. R. Co. The case in 35 Ill. recognizes the doctrine of the Schuyler County Case, and goes upon the ground that the ayes and noes were not called, and spread upon the journals of the house, on the passage of the bill. In Ryan v. Lynch it appeared from the journal that the bill was read twice in the senate, but the journal was silent as to the third reading, and it did not show any call of the ayes and noes on the final passage of the bill. The decision was that as the proceedings in the senate, certified by the secretary of state, were competent proof of the facts therein stated the failure of the journal to show a call of the ayes and noes was fatal to the bill. Indeed, we do not find that any of the numerous decisions of the state court relating to the passage of bills by the legislature have modified or overruled the doctrine announced in Schuyler County Supers. v. People, Rock Island & A. R. Co. With that doctrine we are entirely satisfied. It is in harmony with the adjudications in many of the states whose Constitutions have provisions similar to those in the Constitution of Illinois which we have been considering. We therefore hold that the mere silence of the senate journal as to whether the act of 1869 was read the second time in that body does not justify us in holding it to be invalid." The constitutional provision of Illinois under which said decision was made is as follows: "Each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings. The yeas and nays of the members shall on any question, at the desire of any two of them, be entered on the journal." Const. 1848, art. 3, § 13. Section 18, art. 3, of our Constitution is as follows: "Each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings; and the yeas and nays of the members of each house on any question shall at the request of any three members present, be entered on the journal." The purpose and intent of the said sections are substantially the same. In Illinois the yeas and nays must be entered on the journal at the "desire" of any two members, and in Idaho at the request of any three members. And, so far as the question under consideration is concerned, §§ 13 and 21 of art. 3 of the Constitution of Illinois are substantially the same as §§ 14 and 15 of the Constitution of Idaho. Said § 21 of the Illinois Constitution provides that on the final passage of all bills the vote shall be by yeas and nays, and shall be entered on the journals, while § 15 of art. 3 of the Idaho Constitution provides substantially the same.

The weight of authority under Constitutions similar to ours, so far as I have examined, is that, unless the journal affirmatively shows that some requirement of the Constitution in the passage of a bill has been omitted, the presumption is that such requirement has been complied with, although the journal be silent in regard thereto, except where the Constitution commands such act to be entered on the journal. For example, where the Constitution declares that on the final passage of a bill the vote must be by yeas and nays, and entered on the journal, in such a case the act would be held invalid if the journal failed to affirmatively show that such vote was taken and entered as commanded by the Constitution. In the case of Schuyler County Supers. v. People, Rock Island & A. R. Co. 25 Ill. 183, it is held, under that provision of the Constitution requiring a bill to be read in either house on three different days, that, if the journal is silent as to the readings of the bill, it will be presumed that the bill was read. It is stated in Illinois v. Illinois C. R. Co. 88 Fed. Rep. 730; that the decision in the Schuyler County Case is in harmony with the adjudications of many states, and the court cites Miller v. State, 8 Ohio St. 475; McCulloch v. State, 11 Ind. 424; State, Minnesota R. Constr. Co., v. Hastings, 24 Minn. 78; English v. Oliver, 28 Ark. 317; Chicot County v. Davies, 40 Ark. 266; State, Atty. Gen., v. Francis, 26 Kan. 724; Re Vanderberg, 28 Kan. 243; State, Atty. Gen., v. Mead, 71 Mo. 268. See also to the same effect Pack v. Barton, 47 Mich. 520; Detroit v. Detroit Board of Assessors, 91 Mich. 78, 16 L. R. A. 59; Walker v. Griffith, 60 Ala. 367; Blessing v. Galveston, 42 Tex. 641; Prescott v. Illinois & M. Canal, 19 Ill. 824. In McCulloch v. State, 11 Ind. 424, it was held: "Where the legislative journals are silent touching a step in the proceedings which the Constitution requires to be taken [in the passage of a bill] it will be presumed by the courts that the constitutional requirement was complied with." It is stated by Judge Cooley, in Constitutional Limitations, 6th ed. at page 167, as follows: "The journals which each house keeps of its proceedings ought to show whether this rule is complied with or not; but in case they do not, the passage in the manner provided by the Constitution must be presumed, in accordance with the general rule which presumes the proper discharge of official duty."

On the second point in the opinion in this case we held that amendments to a bill must be read three times on three several days, the same as the original bill. In People, Beardsley, v. Wallace, 70 Ill. 620, it is held that the constitutional provision requiring bills to be read on three several days before their passage does not apply to amendments to such bills. Mr. Sutherland, in his work on Statutory Construction (§ 49) says: "The readings required on bills are intended to afford opportunities for deliberate consideration of them in detail, and for amendment. Hence, amendments are admissible during the progress of a bill through the process of enactment; they are not subject to the same rule as bills in regard to the number of readings. They must be germane to the subject of the bill, and are not required to be read three times. Nor does concurrence by one house in amendments made by the other require the yeas and nays, and their entry on the journal, under the provision for these things, on the final passage of bills." See also Miller v. State, 8 Ohio St. 475. The rule for which I contend does not relieve the members of either house from keeping their oaths of office, and, if they conscientiously keep them inviolate, they will see to it that each and every constitutional requirement in the enactment of laws is fully and fairly met. The commands found in §§ 13-15, art. 3, of the Constitution of this state, are directed to the members of the legislature, and their oaths of office require them to see to it that the provisions of those sections are conscientiously complied with. The rule holding that, if the journal is silent upon matters which are not expressly required to be entered thereon in the passage of a bill, the presumption is that the legislature complied with the requirements of the Constitution, does not relieve the legislature from keeping a full and complete journal of its proceedings; and under the first clause of § 18, art. 3, it is commanded to do so. My conclusion is that a law passed by the legislature should not be held invalid because of the fact that the journals fail to show that each and every act required by the Constitution to be done in the passage of such law had been done, unless such act or proceeding is expressly commanded by the Constitution to be entered on the journal. As, for instance, the vote on the final passage of a bill is commanded by the Constitution to be taken by yeas and nays and entered on the journal. If the journal was silent as to the yeas and nays being taken, in such case the court would have jurisdiction to hold such bill invalid, and should do so; but if the journal was silent as to the printing of the bill, and the three several readings in each house, and of the adoption of an amendment by yeas and nays vote, as those acts are not expressly commanded to be entered in the journal, the presumption would be that those necessary acts were done, and such bill held valid. Otherwise if the journal fail to show the final passage of such bill by a yeas and nays vote, as the final passage of a bill is expressly commanded to be by yeas and nays, and entered on the journal. And, further, that amendments to a bill are not subject to that provision of the Constitution requiring bills to be read on three several days in each house. The original opinion should be modified as above indicated, or a rehearing granted.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

LOUISVILLE, NEW ALBANY, & CHICAGO RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,v.
William P. KEEFER.

(146 Ind. 21.)

1. A contract by an express company authorized by a messenger in its employ, that in consideration that the express company be permitted to do business on a railroad the railroad company will be exempted from all liability for injuries to the messenger, is binding on the messenger, since the railroad company in making it acts, not as a public, but as a private, carrier.
2. A railroad company cannot enforce a contract between a messenger and an express company that the railroad company will not be held liable for accidental injuries to the messenger, of the making of which the railroad company has no knowledge.

(October 1, 1894.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Greene County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Baker & Daniels and Davis & Moffett for appellant.Messrs. Matson & Giles for appellee.Monks, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee was employed as an express messenger by the American Express Company, which was carrying on the express business over the road of appellant between Bedford and Switz City, Indiana. While so employed, and engaged in his usual duties on the express car of said train, the place provided by appellant for him to ride, he was injured by the falling of appellant's railroad bridge, and brought this action against appellant to recover damages therefor. A demurrer to the complaint for want of facts was overruled. Appellant answered in three paragraphs, and appellee's demurrers to the second and third of said paragraphs were sustained. The case was tried by a jury, and a verdict returned in favor of appellee, and, over a motion for a new trial, judgment was rendered against appellant. The action of the court in overruling the demurrer to the complaint, and in sustaining the demurrer to the second and third paragraphs of answer, is assigned as error. It is first insisted that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint. While the allegations are not as specific and complete as they should have been made, we have concluded that the complaint was sufficient on demurrer. The third paragraph of answer avers that the appellee was at the time of injury upon the train, and in the express car, as a messenger of the American Express Company in charge of its express matter then therein; that he had not paid or tendered fare or compensation for his carriage, nor had he agreed to pay; that his right to be upon the train was secured to him and to the express company by a contract in writing between the railroad company and the express company, and that he was then riding upon the train in pursuance of the contract, and not otherwise, and that the only compensation the railroad was to receive was the compensation to be paid by the express company, under the contract for the express privileges granted it thereby. It is also alleged: That appellee, in consideration of his employment by the express company, and at the time thereof, executed a contract in writing (which is set out in the answer) in which appellee covenanted and agreed as follows: "And whereas such express company, under its contracts with many of the corporations and persons owning or operating such railroad, stage, or steamboat lines, is or may be obligated to indemnify and save harmless such corporations and persons from and against all claims for injuries sustained by its employees: Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises and of my said employment, . . . I do hereby assume all risks of accidents and injuries which I shall meet or sustain in the course of my employment, whether occasioned or resulting by or from the gross or other negligence of any corporation or person engaged in any manner in operating any railroad or vessel or vehicle, or of any employee of any such corporation or person otherwise, and whether resulting in my death or otherwise. And I do hereby agree to indemnify and save harmless the American Express Company of and from any and all claims which may be made against it at any time by any corporation or person under any agreement which it has made, or may hereafter make, arising out of any claim or recovery upon my part, or the part of my representatives, for damages sustained by reason of my injury or death, whether such injury or death result from the gross negligence of any person or corporation, or of any employee of any person or corporation, or otherwise. And I hereby bind myself, my heirs, executors, and administrators, with the payment to such express company, upon demand, of any sum which it may be compelled to pay in consequence of any such claim, or in defending the same, including all counsel fees and expenses of litigation connected therewith. I do further agree that, in case I shall at any time suffer any injury, I will at once, without demand, and at my own expense, execute and deliver to the corporation or person owning or operating the railroad, stage, or steamboat line upon which I shall be so injured a good and sufficient release, under my hand and seal, of all claims, demands, and causes of action arising out of such injury, or connected with or resulting therefrom. I do hereby ratify all agreements heretofore made by said express company with any corporation or persons operating any railroad, stage, or steamboat line in which such express company has agreed, in substance, that its employees shall have no cause of action for injuries sustained in the course of their employment upon the line of such contracting party; and I agree to be bound by each and every such agreement, in so far as the provisions thereof relating to injuries sustained by employees of the company are concerned, as fully as if I were a party thereto. And I do hereby authorize and empower said express company, at any time while I shall remain in its service, to contract for me and in my behalf, in its own name or in mine, with any corporation or person operating any railroad, stage, or steamboat line, for my transportation as messenger or employee, free of charge, upon the condition and consideration that neither I nor my personal representative, nor any person claiming under me, will make any claim for compensation because of any injury sustained by me, whether resulting from the gross negligence of such corporation or persons, or of any employee of such corporation or persons, or otherwise, and the contracts so made shall be as binding and obligatory upon me as if signed and delivered by me. And I do further agree that the provisions of this agreement shall be held to inure to the benefit of any and every corporation, and to all persons, upon whose railroads, stage, or steamboat lines the American Express Company shall forward merchandise, as fully and completely as if made directly with such corporation or persons." That, under the contract between the express company and appellant, said express company was granted express privileges and facilities on the railroad lines of appellant, and the express company agreed with appellant that "it is mutually understood and agreed by and between the parties hereto that the express company will assume all risks and damages to its property, freight, and valuable packages, and also assume all risks and damages to its agents and messengers, while on the said road."

Appellee insists that a common carrier cannot protect itself by contract from liability for negligence to a person riding as appellee was on appellant's train, for the reason that such a contract is void, as against public policy. This is a correct statement of the law in this state, where the carrier is at the time performing a duty it owes to the public as a common carrier.

A common carrier may, however, become a private carrier or bailee for hire, where, as a matter of accommodation or special engagement, he undertakes to carry something which it is not his business to carry. New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 24 U. S. 17 Wall. on page 377, 21 L. ed. 639; Coup v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 56 Mich. 111, 56 Am. Rep. 374; Robertson v. Old Colony R. Co. 156 Mass. 525; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Wallace, 24 U. S. App. 589, 66 Fed. Rep. 506, 14 C. C. A. 257, 30 L. R. A. 161. Was appellant, in the carriage for the express company of goods and appellee, its agent in charge thereof, performing a duty as a common carrier, or was it performing a service foreign to its duties as a common carrier, and which it could not have been compelled to perform? Railroad companies are not required, by usage or common law, to transport the traffic of independent express companies over its lines, in the manner in which the traffic is usually carried and handled; and they need not, in the absence of a statute requiring it, furnish to such express companies equal facilities for doing an express business upon their passenger trains. Sargent v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 115 Mass. 416; Memphis & L. R. R. Co. v. Southern Exp. Co. ("Express Cases,") 117 U. S. 1, 29 L. ed. 791. In the case last cited the railroad companies had undertaken to perform for the public the express business before that time done over the same lines by express companies. The express companies applied for space in the express cars for their goods and messengers, and the railroad companies refused to furnish the space or carry their messengers, and these suits were brought to compel the railroad to furnish the desired express facilities. The court held that it was not the duty of railroads to carry the goods and messengers of express companies, and that a railroad in such service was not performing a duty it owed to the public, as a common carrier; that such right could only be acquired by an express company by contract with the railroad company. The court, by Mr. Chief Justice Waite, said: "The reason is obvious why special contracts in reference to this business are necessary. The transportation required is of a kind which must, if possible, be had, for the most part on passenger trains. It requires, not only speed, but reasonable certainty as to the quantity that will be carried at any one time. As the things carried are to be kept in the personal custody of the messenger or other employee of the express company, it is important that a certain amount of car space should be specially set apart for the business, and that this should, as far as practicable, be put in the exclusive possession of the expressman in charge. As the business to be done is 'express,' it implies access to the train for loading at the latest, and for unloading at the earliest, convenient moment. All this is entirely inconsistent with the idea of an express business on passenger trains free to all express carriers. Railroad companies are by law carriers of both persons and property. Passenger trains have from the beginning been provided for the transportation primarily of passengers and their baggage. This must be done with reasonable promptness and with reasonable comfort to the passenger. The express business on passenger trains is in a degree subordinate to the passenger business, and it is consequently the duty of a railroad company in arranging for the express to see that there is as little interference as possible with the wants of passengers. This implies a special understanding and agreement as to the amount of car space that will be afforded, and the conditions on which it is to be occupied, the particular trains that can be used, the places at which they shall stop, the price to be paid, and all the varying details of a business which is to be adjusted between two public servants, so that each can perform in the best manner its own particular duties. All this must necessarily be a matter of bargain, and it by no means follows that, because a railroad company can serve one express company in one way, it can as well serve another company in the same way, and still perform its other obligations to the public in a satisfactory manner. . . . The railroad company performs its whole duty to the public at large and to each individual when it affords the public all reasonable express accommodations. If this is done, the railroad company owes no duty to the public as to the particular agencies it shall select for that purpose. . . . The exact question then is, whether these express companies can now demand as a right what they have heretofore had only as by permission. That depends, as is conceded, on whether all railroad companies are now by law charged with the duty of carrying all express companies in the way that express carriers when taken are usually carried, just as they are with the duty of carrying all passengers and freights when offered in the way that passengers and freight are carried. The contracts which these companies once had are now out of the way, and the companies at this time possess no other rights than such as belong to any other company or person wishing to do an express business upon these roads. If they are entitled to the relief they ask it is because it is the duty of the railroad companies to furnish express facilities to all alike who demand them."

In the case of Coup v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 56 Mich. 111, 56 Am. Rep. 874, the plaintiff, the proprietor of a circus, sued the defendant railway company, as a carrier, for injuries to the proprietor's cars and equipment, and to persons and animals, received by reason of a collision of two trains on defendant's road while plaintiff's circus train was being hauled over the road under a special contract exempting the railroad company from liability for such injuries, although caused by the negligence of defendant's servants. The railway company, under the contract, furnished the engines and train crews to transport plaintiff's cars, loaded with circus performers, animals, tents, etc.; and the contract provided that plaintiff was to pay a certain fixed sum "for the use of said machinery, motive power and men, and the above-mentioned privileges," the price "for the run" to each of several cities to be paid at the times named therein. It was stipulated that the defendant did not act in the premises "as a carrier," but merely as a "hirer of said machinery, motive power, right of way, and of the men to move and work the same," etc. The contract provided that the railroad company should not be responsible for injury resulting from its own negligence "in running the cars or otherwise," and provided that two advertising cars of plaintiff should be hauled in defendant's passenger trains. The circus train ran in two "sections." The forward one—for some cause not shown—was stopped, and the second section was allowed to collide with it, causing the injuries sued for. It was held that it was legal and proper, in such a contract, to stipulate that the railroad company should not be responsible for damages caused by its negligence. The court, by Campbell, J., said: "Unless this undertaking was one entered into by the defendant as a common carrier, there is very little room for controversy. . . . If it was not a contract of common carriage, we need not consider how far in that character contracts of exemption from liability may extend. In our view, it was in no sense a common carrier's contract, if it involved any principle of the law of carriers at all. . . . It cannot be claimed on any legal principle that plaintiff could, as a matter of right, call upon defendant to move his trains under such circumstances and on such conditions, and if he could not, then he could only do so on such terms as defendant saw fit to accept. . . . We think the defendant was not liable in the action, and it should have been taken from the jury and a verdict ordered of no cause of action." A case very similar to the last was the Massachusetts case of Robertson v. Old Colony R. Co. 156 Mass. 525. In that case the plaintiff was an employee of a circus proprietor, and sued for injuries received while he was riding over defendant's road in a car of his employer, which was being hauled under a special contract. The trial court ordered a verdict for defendant. The court, in affirming the case, said: "Unless the defendant was under a common-law or statutory obligation to carry the plaintiff in the manner he was carried at the time of the accident, it did not stand towards him in the relation of a common carrier, and the plaintiff cannot recover." The contract provided for hauling the cars of the circus, and the circus proprietor assumed all risk, and agreed to "exonerate and save harmless" the defendant "from any and all claims for damages to persons and property." "This contract," the court said, "the defendant had the right to make, as it was under no obligation to draw the cars as a common carrier."

In Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Wallace, 14 C. C. A. 257, 66 Fed. Rep. 506, 24 U. S. App. 590, 30 L. R. A. 181, the United States circuit court of appeals (seventh circuit) held that when a railroad company, by special agreement, hauls the cars and property of a circus over its lines, it is not a common carrier, but is acting outside of its duties as such, and therefore may lawfully contract for entire exemption from liability for its negligence. The court said: "But if the company, in carrying the plaintiff's property under the contract and in the circumstances in which the undertaking was entered into, was not acting as a common carrier of the plaintiff's goods, but in the capacity of an ordinary private carrier for hire, then the company had the right to make the contract, and both parties will be bound by its terms. That the company in carrying the goods under the contract was a private, and not a common or public carrier, is the conclusion which the court has reached." See also Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 17 C. C. A. 62, 70 Fed. Rep. 201, 36 U. S. App. 152, 80 L. R. A. 193.

In Bates v. Old Colony R. Co. 147 Mass. 255, an express messenger was injured while riding as messenger in a baggage car in a passenger train. The contract by which the express company's freight and messenger were carried provided that the messenger should be in the express car, and that the railroad company would issue to him "a season ticket" at season-ticket rates, being below regular full fare. The contract between the two companies further provided that the express company and its messengers should "assume all risks of accidents and injuries," and that the railroad company should be free and discharged from all claims and demands growing out of any injuries received by the messenger while on the road. The messenger, at the request of the express company, executed and delivered to the railroad company, in pursuance of the agreement between the two companies, an agreement reciting that, by the rules of the railroad company, passengers were not permitted to ride in the baggage cars, and reciting that the passenger was the holder of a "season ticket," and was an express messenger, and as such desired to ride in the baggage car, "for the more convenient despatch of his business" as such. The agreement then continued, "that, in consideration of said company allowing him to ride in baggage cars on its trains, the undersigned will assume all risk of accidents and injuries resulting therefrom, and will hold said company free and discharged from all claims and demands in any way growing out of any injuries received by him while so riding." The messenger executed this agreement unwillingly, and only because he understood that he could not retain his employment as messenger unless he did execute it. The season ticket prohibited its use for express business, but had stamped upon it a statement that "the holder of this ticket, having released the company from all liability, will be permitted to ride in the baggage car." There was a notice posted in the baggage car, and the rule it announced was uniformly enforced, that "no passenger will be allowed to ride in the baggage car on any train unless he has signed a release discharging the company from all claims and demands in any way growing out of any accident or injuries while riding in such car," etc. It happened in this case that the injury would not have been received if the messenger had been in the passenger car, instead of the express car. The court held that the contract was blinding, and worked a release of such injuries as were received by reason of the plaintiff's riding in the baggage car. The court said: "The question of the right of carriers to limit their liability for negligence in the discharge of their duty as carriers, by contracts with their customers or passengers in regard to such duties, does not arise under this contract as construed in this case. See New York, C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 857, 21 L. ed. 627, and Griswold v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 53 Conn. 871, 55 Am. Rep. 115. It was not a contract for carriage over the road, but for the use of a particular car. The consideration of the plaintiff's agreement was not the performance of anything by the defendant which it was under any obligation to do, or which the plaintiff had any right to have done. It was a privilege granted to the plaintiff. The plaintiff was not compelled to enter into the contract in order to obtain the rights of a passenger." In a later case in the same court, Hosmer v. Old Colony R. Co. 156 Mass. 506, an express messenger riding in the baggage car under a similar contract, and with a similar ticket, was injured in a wreck which involved the whole train, and in which many passengers in the ordinary passenger cars were killed, and others injured. The train was derailed by defendant's negligence. The court refers to the case in 147 Mass., and states that the decision was then 38 L. R. A.

limited to injuries occasioned by riding in the baggage car, and did not involve the application of the release to injuries otherwise received. The court said: "This question is now presented to us, and we are of opinion that the contract does include such injuries. The contract, after reciting that the railroad company does not allow passengers to ride in the baggage cars of any of its trains, and that the undersigned (the plaintiff) 'is desirous of riding in such car for the more convenient despatch of his business as an expressman,' proceeds as follows: 'It is understood and agreed that, in consideration of said company allowing him to ride in baggage cars on its trains, the undersigned will assume all risks of accidents and injuries resulting therefrom, and will hold said company free and discharged from all claims and demands in any way growing out of any injuries received by him while so riding.' It seems to us that the natural and fair import of the words used was that the plaintiff should take the risk of all injuries received by him while riding in the baggage car, however arising. The place where he was riding was one in which the defendant was under no obligation to carry him. The contract gave the plaintiff a privilege which he sought for his own convenience. That it was a valid contract cannot be questioned since the decision in Bates v. Old Colony R. Co. 147 Mass. 255. See also Quimby v. Boston & M. R. Co. 160 Mass. 865, 5 L. R. A. 846."

Under the doctrine declared in the Express Cases, supra, the property was being carried by appellant, not as a common carrier in the performance of a public duty, but being carried, with a messenger in charge, as a private carrier; the right to have it and him carried having first been secured to the express company by private contract,—the only way known to the law by which the right either as to the goods, or appellee as express messenger in charge, could be acquired. Appellee, when he went upon the appellant's train and took charge of the express packages in the baggage car, did not go as a passenger who merely desired to be carried on the train from one point to another. Carriage was not the object of his going upon the train. That was merely incidental. His purpose was not to be upon the train in the cars provided for passengers, but that he might handle and care for the property of his employer thereon, in the space set apart in the baggage car for that purpose. Under the authorities cited, it was not the duty of appellant, as a common carrier, to carry for the express company the goods or messenger in charge of them. The contract between appellant and the express company gave it and its messenger rights which appellant, as a common carrier, could not have been compelled to grant. Express Cases, 117 U. S. 1, 29 L. ed. 791; Bates v. Old Colony R. Co. 147 Mass. 255; Hosmer v. Old Colony R. Co. 156 Mass. 506.

The contracts set out in the third paragraph of answer were not in regard to any duties appellant was required to perform as a common carrier, nor did such contracts attempt to limit the liability of appellant for negligence in the discharge of its duties as a common carrier. The same are therefore binding upon all the parties thereto. Appellee, by his contract, assumed all the dangers of the trip, however occasioned, and undertook and agreed to release and discharge appellant from all liability if he in any way should be injured in his person by the negligence of appellant, and authorized and empowered the express company to enter into a contract exempting appellant from all liability for injuries to appellee. The contract of the express company with appellant was therefore binding upon appellee, the same as if he had executed it in person. It follows that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the third paragraph of answer.

It is not alleged in the second paragraph of answer that the express company or appellee, in any contract with appellant, ever assumed any risks or damages of any kind, or that the appellant had notice or knowledge of the terms of the agreement between appellee and the express company. The mere fact that appellee had entered into the contract alleged with the express company would not entitle appellant to the benefit thereof. The court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the second paragraph of answer.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to overrule the demurrer to the third paragraph of answer, and for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

a. As between different territorial jurisdictions.

One of the important questions which is likely to arise in case of a company doing business not only in many of the United States but in foreign countries also is, By what court shall the assets be collected and distributed? Many of the states require companies doing business within their borders to keep a fund on deposit there for the protection of local policy holders, and even in the absence of such requirement the failure of the company is very likely to occur when the assets are widely scattered. The question whether these assets shall all be gathered and sent to the company's home for distribution, or whether each court shall gather and distribute the funds found within its jurisdiction, has not been very satisfactorily answered, although the weight of authority and reason favors the transmission of the fund to the home office except possibly in case of matured claims.

If the statutes of the state in which the company was created have provided for winding up the affairs of the company by a receiver appointed there, policy holders in other states cannot attach assets there for the recovery of their claims, but all the assets must be gathered by the receiver and distributed by him unless there is a domestic statute establishing a different rule. Rockover v. Life Asso. of America, 77 Va. 85.

Where the charter of the company provides that upon its dissolution all its property shall vest in the officers of the state of its creation, policy holders in other states cannot acquire a priority for payment out of assets in the state of their domicile. Rundel v. Life Asso. of America, 4 Woods, 94.

The mere fact that the company provided for departments in which its assets should be kept will not give the holders of policies in these departments any prior right to the assets there. Taylor v. Life Asso. of America, 13 Fed. Rep. 497.

The foreign policy holder impliedly agrees to the statutes of the state in which the company is organized, so that a receiver appointed in that state will control all of the company's assets. Parsons v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. 31 Fed. Rep. 205.

A resident of a state other than that where the company is incorporated will not be permitted to attach the reserve fund within his state to compel payment of his claim on the policy where the company is in process of being wound up in the state of its domicile. Fry v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. 31 Fed. Rep. 197.

And the same ruling applies in case of the holder of a death claim. Wetlgartner v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. 32 Fed. Rep. 314.

with all other creditors in the general fund of the company's assets after they have exhausted a special fund which is held in trust for them alone.

4. Taxes upon the shares of stock in an insurance company which are by statute charged to and made payable by the corporation are a demand payable out of its assets in the hands of its receiver in case it becomes insolvent after they become due.

5. A preference of claims of clerks, servants, and employees of an insolvent corporation does not extend to a trust fund devoted to a special purpose, as in case of a deposit for the benefit of policy holders of an insurance company.

6. An insurance adjuster, or a person rendering services of a higher degree than a clerk, is not included among the "clerks, servants, and employees" of an insurance company to whom the statutes give a preference in distribution of the company's assets when it is insolvent.

7. On the breach of the contract of an insurance policy by insolvency of the company the policy holder has a claim for the value of the destroyed policy, which consists solely of an unearned or return premium, against the assets of the company.

8. Losses which happen after the insolvency of an insurance company are not provable against the funds in the hands of a

The members of a mutual insurance company belonging to the state department of the general company have no right to retain the assets of the company in that state for the payment of their claims, but must permit them to go to the home office of the company to be distributed equitably among all policy holders. Davis v. Life Asso. of America, 11 Fed. Rep. 781. In that case the court says that a provision that a certain fund should be kept in the state in which the company is doing business as a contingent fund to pay the expenses and losses from year to year as the same become due and payable, does not dedicate this fund to the payment of policy holders in that state.

The placing of the insurance company in the hands of a receiver, and an assignment to him of assets under order of the court, will pass to him a right to premium notes of debtors residing in other states which will take priority to subsequent attachment at the residence of the debtors. Taylor v. Life Asso. of America, 18 Fed. Rep. 497.

In Hamilton v. Chouteau, 2 McCrary, 509, the court refused to take jurisdiction of a suit by policy holders against an insolvent insurance company for the reason that a receiver had been appointed in another court, and that if it took jurisdiction it would be compelled to bring in all parties and take custody of the assets, for equality is equity.

But, on the other side, it has been held that a fund deposited by a foreign insurance company with the state officers in accordance with state laws for the protection of local policy holders will not, on the ground of comity, be remitted to a foreign jurisdiction until the claims of the domestic policy holders have been satisfied. Hughes v. Hunner, 81 Wis. 118.

So, the courts of a state may wind up the affairs of a foreign insurance company which has become insolvent so far as to administer assets within its jurisdiction and distribute them among domestic creditors. Smith v. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. 6 Lea, 564, Affirming 8 Tenn. Ch. 502.

And in Piedmont & A. L. Ins. Co. v. Wallin, 58 Miss. 1, where insolvency did not appear, it was held that the sum deposited in accordance with the Mississippi statutes by a foreign company for the privilege of doing business in that state was for the benefit of persons who took out policies in that state, and could not be reached by those obtaining policies elsewhere.

Under the Virginia statutes the holder of a policy in a foreign company which has deposited bonds with the state treasurer may subject these bonds to the payment of a claim for the return of premiums paid on the policy. Universal L. Ins. Co. v. Cogbill, 30 Gratt. 72.

And it has been held in that state that holders of policies in a foreign company could enforce their claims by attachment against property found in the state. But in that case proceedings to declare the company insolvent had not been instituted when the attachment suits were filed. Universal L. Ins. Co. v. Binford, 76 Va. 103.

But after the claims of domestic creditors have been satisfied the fund which has been deposited with the state treasurer by a foreign corporation is not subject to attachment by foreign creditors, but must be turned over to the receiver of the company. Rollo v. Andes Ins. Co. 23 Gratt. 509, 14 Am. Rep. 147.

If the state statute provides that in case the laws of another state where the company is doing business require the maintenance in that state of a fund upon which holders of policies there shall have a lien, such policy holders shall not be entitled to share in the assets in the state of the company's creation until the amount of the assets in the other state shall be deducted from the claim; the holder of such policies is entitled to no greater sum than is sufficient to make him equal to creditors of the same class in the state of the creation of the company. Re Life Asso. of America, 91 Mo. 177; S. C. sub nom. Bockover v. Superintendent of Ins. Department (Mo.) 8 West. Rep. 322.

If before the proceedings are instituted for the appointment of a receiver, policy holders in another state bring suit there and appropriate part of the assets of the company there to the payment of their claims they are entitled to prove for the residue in the proceedings to dissolve the company, and the amount they have received cannot be used to reduce their demand beyond that amount. People v. Universal L. Ins. Co. 42 Hun, 616. And the case of People v. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. 101 N. Y. 636, is distinguished, where the circumstances were similar except that in the latter case the assets in the foreign state were appropriated after the appointment of the receiver, and it was held that the amount so obtained should be deducted from his proportionate share of the assets of the company.

In Garham v. Mutual Aid Soc. 161 Mass. 357, it was held that policy holders from other states who had attached property or proved their claims there would not be permitted to prove their claims in Massachusetts unless they discharged their attachment and canceled their proofs so that the fund could be distributed ratably.

The settlement of the affairs of the Order of Iron Hall has given rise to much discussion as to whether or not the funds would be transmitted to the receiver in the state of the company's organization or would be distributed to domestic creditors. Although the order was not an insurance society in its strictest sense; the rulings in those cases may throw light on the general question as to whether or not the assets will be sent to the parent state. The importance of distributing assets of an insolvent insurance company at an early date prevents postponing the settlement to await the determination of every contingency on which its policy engagements are suspended, and the court may fix a reasonable time within which claims must be filed in order to participate, although this may result in a misfortune to those whose claims are cut off.

premise sitting, O. of I. H. 3 Pa. Dist. R. 323; Schroder v. Supreme Sitting, O. of I. H. 1 Ohio, Dec. 408; Bakup v. Iron Hall, cited in 1 Ohio Dec. 409,—the court remitted the proceeds to the receiver in the parent state, while in Fawcett v. Supreme Sitting, O. of I. H. 64 Conn. 170, 24 L. R. A. 825, and Lindquist v. Glines, 3 Misc. 214, it refused to do so.

In Failey v. Fee, 88 Md. 83, 32 L. R. A. 311, it was held that in so far as actual debts existed the fund would be distributed by the court in whose hands it was, but that as to persons who still remained members of the association by reason of the fact that their claims had not yet matured they must go to the parent state and seek payment from the receiver appointed there.

In Failey v. Talbee, 55 Fed. Rep. 882, the court held that it was competent to transmit the assets to the foreign receiver, but that the facts before it were not sufficient to cause it to do so, and so held the case for further proof before entering such a decree.

In Ware v. Supreme Sitting, O. of I. H. (N. J. Ch.) 23 Atl. 1041, the ruling was placed squarely upon the terms of the contract itself, the court saying that the rule that courts will not direct the transfer of funds to an officer in another state for distribution, but will rather provide for and take care of the just claims of its own citizens in preference to those of any other state or territory, applies only in cases of a contest or race between different creditors of the same debtor which creditors are under no obligation to each other and have entered into no mutual compact, this cannot be said of the case we are now dealing with. Here there is but a single contract, and all the persons interested in these assets are bound each to the other by the terms of that contract. This contract provides for an equal distribution of the funds among all those who comply with its terms.

In Buswell v. Supreme Sitting, O. of I. H. 161 Mass. 224, 23 L. R. A. 361, it was held that the title to the 20 per cent which was retained by the local branches was in the general order, and that by comity a receiver in one state may be ordered to pay over the fund to the parent receiver where the same principle governing the distribution of the fund would be acted on in both states, and it appears that the domestic creditors would be fairly treated in the distribution. The court says that in the distribution of such a fund when the property of the trust is found in many different states, comity requires that the court should do all that should be done to enforce, as far as practicable, a speedy equitable distribution of the whole property among those entitled to it.

In Durward v. Jewett, 46 La. Ann. 559, it was held that the reserve fund was a trust fund held, not alone for the benefit of the members of the local branch, but for all the membership of the order. And the fact that the trust cannot be carried out as originally intended cannot deprive those members of the rights each has acquired in the fund.

The decision is put expressly on the contract of the members.

In Schroder v. Supreme Sitting, O. of I. H. 1 Ohio Dec. 408, it is said that no member of one branch can have any preferred rights over any other members of any other branch, nor is there any distinction made as to territorial or state divisions. The duty of each branch is to send its fund to the supreme body or its receiver, who, under the directions of the court, must distribute to each member pro rata. It is not honest to appropriate to the Ohio members exclusively that which they only have an undivided share in, and a court of equity will not sanction it.

In Baldwin v. Hoamer, 101 Mich. 119, 25 L. R. A. 743, the court says that the local branches and their officers and members are part and parcel of the corporation and cannot refuse to turn over the assets for distribution by its receiver, but the court adds that such order should be made only when it is made certain to the court that the members from its state would share proportionately with the other members throughout the organization.

Kean v. Supreme Sitting, O. of I. H. 3 Pa. Dist. R. 323, was decided on the ground that the members of the branches were not creditors of the association, and therefore their claims were not adverse to, but under, it.

In Fawcett v. Supreme Sitting, O. of I. H. 64 Conn. 170, 24 L. R. A. 825, Judge Hamersley held to the duty of the court to transmit the fund to the parent receiver in ordinary cases, but claimed that the rule did not apply in this case because the scheme of the Iron Hall was so far against public policy that it was not lawful under the laws of Connecticut; but the majority of the court places its ruling upon the fact that equity will best be done as between the parties before it by retaining the funds in controversy in the hands of the receiver appointed by it for distribution among the certificate holders of the order by whose contribution they were originally accumulated. As against a demand of a foreign receiver the members of each branch whose contributions created this reserve fund have, under the conditions discussed, an equitable lien upon it which the courts of their own state can best protect, especially where the parent receiver claims the fund for distribution among the creditors of the corporation generally without any distinction in favor of certificate holders.

In Lindquist v. Glines, 3 Misc. 214, it was held that the reserve fund of each local branch should be repaid to the members whose assessments had contributed to make it up. The court says it would certainly appear to be inequitable to take this fund and send it to a foreign jurisdiction to be distributed among the members of the order when by the very terms of the law creating it it was to be retained by each branch. To allow this money to be paid into a foreign jurisdiction merely for the purpose of distribution would be to appropriate the money paid for the purpose of establishing a reserve fund for their own benefit to be applied for the use of other members of the association.

insolvent insurance company when the failure to pay it was merely the result of insolvency.

But in Mosher v. Supreme Sitting, O. of I. H. 88 Hun, 394, it was stated that there was a stipulation that an order had been made upon petition of the local branches of the Order of Iron Hall in the state of New York to turn over to the Indianapolis receiver the funds of the order in the state, except such as would be sufficient to pay judgment creditors in case they established priority of their claims.

b. As between courts and officers.

The question has also arisen as to whether or not the court could take possession of funds which had been placed in the hands of a special depository:

The court will not take from a trustee funds placed in his hands for a specific purpose and distribute them through its receiver to the exclusion of the trustee. Re Home Provident Safety Fund Assn. 129 N. Y. 233.

If the articles of an association created a trustee to administer and distribute the reserve fund the insolvency of the association will not destroy his rights. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Aberle, 18 Misc. 227.

Under the Missouri statutes the court and not the insurance commissioner has the superintendence of the distribution of the assets. Relfe v. Spear, 6 Mo. App. 123.

Under the New York statutes the courts have no power to control the insurance commissioner in the distribution of the securities which have been deposited with him by the company under the laws of the state. Ruggles v. Chapman, 59 N. Y. 163; Affirming Ruggles v. Chapman, 1 Hun, 324; Ruggles v. Chapman, 2 Thomp. & C. 600; Re Guardian Mut. L. Ins. Co. 13 Hun, 115. Affirmed in 74 N. Y. 617.

The court cannot compel the superintendent to turn the funds over to its receiver. People, Ruggles, v. Chapman, 64 N. Y. 557.

And these cases were recognized in Atty. Gen. v. North America L. Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 654, although the court in that case says that the court could determine who were entitled to share in the funds and how they were to be divided among those interested therein.

But under the New York act of 1869 it is the duty of the insurance department to turn the securities over to the receiver. Atty. Gen. v. North American L. Ins. Co. 85 N. Y. 485, 80 N. Y. 152.

The New York act of 1892, permitting receivers to take possession of the funds in the insurance department, includes only companies issuing registered policies and annuity bonds. People v. American Steam Boiler Ins. Co. 147 N. Y. 23, Reversing 87 Hun, 230.

The laws have provided for two classes of insurance, one by policies unregistered but protected by a deposit with the insurance department, the other by registered policies secured by an additional deposit when the company becomes insolvent. The former are to be distributed under an order of the court, and the latter to be sold and the proceeds turned over to the receiver for dis-

The company having created these trusts "in order to strengthen itself" or, in other words, to induce persons to take out policies and pay premiums on the faith of such guarantee, and, presumably, having thereby increased tribution. People, Stout, v. Chapman, 5 Hun, 222.

Prior to the act of 1892 the New York court had no power to compel the insurance commissioner to transfer to a receiver a fund deposited with him by a casualty insurance company. People v. American Steam Boiler Ins. Co. 81 Hun, 498.

The right of any person to share in the assets is to be determined in the action or proceeding in which the appointment of the receiver is made. Rinn v. Astor F. Ins. Co. 59 N. Y. 143.

II. Valuation and adjustment of claims.

a. Date when claims become fixed.

There is considerable difference in the statements of the rule as to the time when the character and amount of the claim become fixed so that subsequent events will not change it. Some cases place it at the time of the insolvency of the company; others at the time of dissolution of the company; others at the appointment of the receiver; others at the time of presentation of the claim. There is probably no great difference in the first three cases because the finding of insolvency, the dissolution of the company, and the appointment of the receiver may occur at or about the same time. But it would seem that correct principles would hardly justify an extension of the time until the claim is actually presented at some of the cases do.

In case of an insurance of credit the insolvency of the company will terminate the risk and entitle the policy holder to recover unearned premiums. Smith v. National Credit Ins. Co. 65 Minn. 233, 33 L. R. A. 511.

So in Boston & A. R. Co. v. Mercantile Trust & D. Co. it is held that in case of insurance against liability for accidents, the insolvency of the company will cancel all policies, so that there will be no liability on accidents happening after that time, but the holders of the policies will be entitled only to unearned premiums.

The holder of a policy in a credit insurance company which becomes insolvent is not entitled to prove for losses sustained by him after the insolvency of the company whether on sales made before or after that date, but is only entitled to a return of the unearned premium. Gray v. Reynolds (N. J. Err. & App.) 37 Atl. 461.

But it has been held that the mere fact of an assignment by a fire insurance company for the benefit of creditors does not terminate all existing policies so as to entitle the holders to the unearned premium from that date. Relfe v. Commercial Ins. Co. 10 Mo. App. 393.

The rights of creditors become fixed by the decree ordering the dissolution of the company. Dean's Appeal, 88 Pa. 101; Insurance Co. v. Furulture Co. 80 Phila. Leg. Int. 81.

When a mutual endowment association is dissolved the maturing of unmaturing certificates is arrested and the holders are entitled to share merely as members in the assets of the company. Re Educational Endowment Assn. 56 Minn. 171.

If a loss occurs subsequent to the date of dissolution the holder of the policy is entitled to only the

The decree of December 12, 1898, having become enrolled when the term at which it was passed elapsed, the rights of all parties were determined by its declaration that the stock in question or its proceeds, if sold, should be held by the receivers "for the benefit of the policy holders of the defendant corporation."

The rights of the policy holders to share in the reserve fund are fixed by the date of the commencement of the proceeding for dissolution of the corporation. Re Equitable Reserve Fund Life Assn. 131 N. Y. 354.

In a very late New York case the status of claimants is fixed by the initiation of proceedings for the dissolution of the society. People v. Commercial Alliance L. Ins. Co. 17 App. Div. 376. The court says in some of the earlier cases a different view seems to have been taken, and the implication seems to be that the earlier cases were wrongly decided, and that the rule in that state now is as stated in that case.

If the receiver gives notice that he will receive no more premiums, the fact of death after premiums are overdue will not prevent the claim from sharing in the distribution of the assets, but the share will be the value of the policy at the time of the dissolution of the company deducting the amount of premiums unpaid at the time of death. Atty. Gen. v. Guardian Mut. L. Ins. Co. 82 N. Y. 338.

Losses which accrue after the appointment of the receiver cannot be allowed by him. Re Commercial Ins. Co. 20 R. I. pt. 1, p. 7.

Holders of policies on the mutual plan are not entitled to prove for losses which occur after the insolvency of the company and appointment of a receiver, although they are not given notice of such facts or of the intention to cancel their policies. Reliance Lumber Co. v. Brown, 4 Ind. App. 62.

If the court has fixed a day before which all claims must be presented or they will be barred, the fact that a claimant is a nonresident and did not know of the order will not furnish a sufficient ground, in case he does not present his claim in time, for extending the time and permitting him to come in and file his claim after the date fixed has expired. *Abraham v. Mr. William A. Fisher, for appellees:

To give a valid claim under a policy of the character of those in this case, it would be necessary that the judgment should be paid or settled by the assured, and then the assured would have a claim upon the insurance company only for the amount of money actually paid on the judgment. If the judgment was settled for less than the face amount of it, the insurance company would be entitled to the benefit of such a settlement. If the judgment never was paid, the insurance company would be liable for nothing.

b. Among policy holders.

The courts do not fully agree as to how far claims which have matured before the insolvency of the company are entitled to be treated as preferred claims in the distribution of assets. But it seems that the tendency of a majority of the courts is to treat the claim as one for the face of the policy and let it share pro rata with the others although there are cases giving it preference in payment.

All the outstanding policies at the date of sequestration of the assets of the company must be made to stand upon the same footing, and the holders are entitled only to the surrender value of the same. Taylor v. North Star Mut. Ins. Co. 46 Minn. 198.

A death loss recognized by the company prior to its insolvency has no priority in the distribution of the fund. Guy v. Globe Ins. Co. (Va.) 9 Ins. L. J. 468.

Where the policy provided that after satisfying all assurances granted by the company previously payable and all prior charges on its funds and property, the funds and property would be liable for its payment, the court held that the sum which had become payable on the policy before the commencement of the winding-up proceedings had no priority over the claims of policy holders whose policies had not become due. *Re International Life Assur. Death claims which have accrued but not become payable prior to the commencement of proceedings for dissolution of the company are not entitled to a priority. Re Equitable Reserve Fund Life Assn. 131 N. Y. 354.

The holder of a death claim which has matured before the insolvency of the company has no lien on the assets of the company prior to its dissolution, and is not entitled to payment in full, but only to a dividend from the assets in the hands of the receiver. Com., Kirpatrick, v. American L. Ins. Co. 170 Pa. 170.

Unmatured endowment policies have no advantage or priority over ordinary unmatured claims in the distribution of assets. People v. Security L. Ins. & A. Co. 7 Abb. N. C. 193.

Most of the cases which have given the matured claims a preference have dealt with peculiar facts which seemed to make it equitable to do so.

Where the reserve fund is dedicated to the payment of reserve certificates to the maximum limit in case of the death of members, the holders of death claims under such certificate of members who died before the commencement of the action of dissolution are entitled to have their claims paid in full before any portion of the fund is distributed among holders of unmatured certificates. People, Atty. Gen., v. Life and Reserve Assn. 150 N. Y. 94.

In a mutual company the holders of policies matured at the time of insolvency are preferred creditors, and they are not liable to contribute to losses. Mayer v. Atty. Gen. 33 N. J. Eq. 815.

The holder of a matured certificate for the payment of a sum of money by a mutual benefit association is a creditor of the association, and as such is entitled to priority in payment over unmatured certificates, and has a right to attach the fund of the association when insolvent. Falley v. Fee, 83 Md. 82, 32 L. R. A. 311.

But it has been held that there is no priority of claim for a death loss which occurs but is not adjusted before the appointment of a receiver, over that of policy holders, to a return of unearned premium, although the policy holders are entitled to share in the profits, such right not making them partners in the concern. Re Security L. Ins. & A. Co. 11 Hun. 93.

So, in case of a mutual aid association the holders of matured certificates and death claims are not creditors of the association in such sense as to entitle them to a preference over other certificate holders. *Re Home Mut. But it says that, even assuming that the contract was valid, yet under the statutes of the state the claimants were not entitled to a preference. c. Set-off.

The claim of right to priority in payment has generally arisen under a claim of right to set-off. The fact that the set-off would give a priority has not always been considered in such cases, and general rules applicable to set-off have been applied which in some cases would allow the right where it would be refused if the further question of preference had been in the mind of the court.

The general rule is that claims for losses may be set off against debts for borrowed money.

The debt for money borrowed to erect a building which is insured in the company which loaned the money, and is destroyed by fire, may be canceled by the amount due on the policy of insurance. Re Globe Ins. Co. 2 Edw. Ch. 625.

The holder of a policy in an insurance company who has borrowed money from the company on 35 L. R. A.

bond and mortgage is entitled to set off a claim for loss under the policy upon the amount due on the bond and mortgage. Holbrook v. American F. Ins. Co. 6 Paige, 220.

If a loss has accrued before the company is placed in the hands of the receiver the claim may be set off against a debt due from the assured to the company. Com. v. Shoe & Leather Dealers' F. & M. Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 181.

A holder of a policy in a life insurance company who is indebted to the company by note and mortgage may set off against the amount so due his claim to recover the amount which he has paid as premiums on his policy, or as much thereof as he is entitled to receive under the conditions incorporated in his policy. Life Assn. of America v. Levy, 33 La. Ann. 1233.

A claim for loss under an insurance policy may be set off by the insured against his indebtedness to the company for borrowed money. Drake v. Rollo, 3 Biss. 273.

The amount due on an endowment policy payable in any event at a fixed time, and sooner if the party dies before that time, should, in settling the company's affairs, be set off against the amount due on a mortgage debt from the holder on the policy to the company. And if the period of payment has not arrived the amount to be paid is the contingent interest to be determined by the tables ordinarily used for that purpose. Carr v. Hamilton, 129 U. S. 251, 32 L. ed. 669.

But the assignee of a claim against an insolvent insurance company for loss under its policies assigned after notice of the insolvency cannot set it off against his previous indebtedness to the company for borrowed money. Hitchcock v. Rollo, 3 Biss. 276.

Under the English statutes the holder of an endowment policy which matures after the petition for winding up but before the winding-up order, who has borrowed money from the society, may set off his debt against his claim upon the policy. Sovereign Life Assur. Co. v. Dodd [1892] 1 Q. B. 405. And this case was affirmed in Sovereign Life Assur. Co. v. Dodd [1892] 2 Q. B. 573.

A loan made by the company upon the policy may be satisfied out of the dividends due the policy. Guy v. Globe Ins. Co. (Va.) 9 Ins. L. J. 466.

Under the English statutes allowing set-off in case of mutual dealings, the insolvency trustee of a holder of policies in a life insurance company who has borrowed money from the company on the faith of the policies, cannot claim the right to set off the present value of the policies at the time the company becomes insolvent against its claim upon him for the amount of the borrowed money. Ex parte Price, L. R. 10 Ch. 648.

On the other hand, when the debt constitutes a part of the guaranty fund of the insurer it is not available for set-off.

In case of a mutual insurance company the holder of a policy cannot set off a loss upon it against the amount of his premium note unless the assets of the company are enough to pay all losses in full. Hillier v. Allegheny County Mut. Ins. Co. 3 Pa. 470. The court says such course would work most unjustly by enabling a member who stood in the double relation of debtor and creditor to get more than his share of the insolvent fund. Where the company is bankrupt each member is entitled to payment, not of his whole loss, but of a part of it in the proportion which the amount of all losses bears to the amount of the joint effects.

A member of a mutual marine insurance company cannot upon its insolvency set off against his indebtedness for premiums due upon policies a loss sustained by him adjusted and payable by the company. The premiums constitute a fund which as insurer he is bound to make good for the benefit of all creditors, and as assured he is bound to take a pro rata dividend from the fund. Lawrence v. Nelson, 21 N. Y. 153.

But notes given for premiums in an ordinary company are not part of the guaranty fund of the company so as to preclude the right of set-off.

Insurance brokers may set off against their liability for premiums, claims on policies which have been taken out in their own names which occurred before the underwriter stopped payment. Koster v. Eason, 2 Maule & S. 112; Grove v. Dubois, 1 T. R. 113; Bize v. Dickason, 1 T. R. 285.

A loss which has happened before the insolvency may be set off upon a note given for premiums. Osgood v. DeGroot, 36 N. Y. 343.

Claims against the company may be set off in a suit on the premium note. Berry v. Brett, 6 Bosw. 627.

In Atty. Gen. v. North American L. Ins. Co. 39 N. Y. 94, it is said that premium notes and loans made on policies are not assets upon which the receiver is entitled to commissions because they constitute proper offsets against the liability of the company.

Insurance brokers cannot set off their damages for losses on other policies which they have had to make good to their principals against a demand by the trustee in bankruptcy of the insurer for salvage money which has come into their hands upon losses which were paid by the insurer before his bankruptcy. *Elgood v. This ruling is placed upon the ground that there is a want of mutuality in the accounts, the fund in the hands of the brokers not being on account of a credit given them by the bankrupt.

The settlement of an insolvent life insurance company's affairs cannot be postponed to await the determination of every contingency on which its policy engagements are suspended.

Taxes.

It has been held that the assets in the hands of a receiver awaiting distribution are not subject to taxation. Brooks v. Hartford, 61 Conn. 125.

The assessment for taxes required to be made upon shares of stock in the corporation is not payable by the receiver. Relfe v. Columbia L. Ins. Co. 11 Mo. App. 374.

But in Schmidt v. Falley (Ind.) 87 L. R. A. 412, which involved funds of a mutual benefit assessment society, it was held that a claim of nonresidents to distributive shares of the property on final settlement will not prevent the taxation of funds in the hands of the receiver as property within the jurisdiction of the state, although the fund had been collected in other states in which the company also did business, and turned over by orders of the courts to the receiver, with the understanding that all holders of certificates in the different states should be ratably paid on final settlement.

So, taxes assessed upon the company before the appointment of the receiver are debts which he must pay, and they have a preference over other claims. Re Commercial Ins. Co. 20 R. I. pt. 1, p. 7.

So, when an insurance company is at the time of its dissolution by decree of court a debtor to the state for taxes on gross premiums, the claim is a charge on the assets in the hands of the receiver. Com. v. American L. Ins. Co. 14 Pa. Co. Ct. 216.

And in BOSTON & A. R. CO. v. MERCANTILE TRUST & D. CO. it is held that if the state imposes a tax on the shares, and requires the company to pay them should the company become insolvent, such taxes if due are debts for which the assets are liable, and will constitute a prior lien for which all funds of the association are liable.

No judgment can be acquired after the presentation of the petition for dissolution of the company, which will be a lien on its assets. Re Berry, 26 Barb. 55.

The holder of an accident insurance policy who has put his claim in judgment more than thirty days before equitable proceedings of insolvency are instituted against the company does not acquire for his claim any preference over the legal claims of the other creditors of the company. The court says they are unable to perceive that the claimant became entitled to any lien upon the funds. There was no attachment or seizure of the funds. His judgment was nothing more than a subsisting claim against the company, and not more just and equitable so far as is seen in any facts which the case discloses. His claim was in one form while other claims existed in different forms. He had taken more advanced steps than other claimants towards collecting his debt, but these steps fell short of establishing any special title to the fund or lien thereon. This is an equitable proceeding and equity is equality. Smith v. Maine Mut. Accl. Assn. 86 Me. 229.

Y. 354; People v. Life Union, 145 N. Y. 806.

Where the plan of the association provided for a death fund and a reserve fund, death claims were held to be entitled to the death fund absolutely, and to share pro rata with other members and creditors in the reserve fund. This was placed upon the ground that the reserve fund was not disposed of by the charter, but must be disposed of on equitable principles. Re Equitable Reserve Fund Life Assn. 131 Hun, 239.

Where the constitution of the society provides for transferring from the reserve fund to the death fund not less than the proceeds of one death assessment, it must be construed as authorizing a transfer only for the payment of death claims arising under reserve certificates where it further provides that no person holding a life certificate shall be entitled to or in any manner derive any benefit from the reserve fund. People, Atty. Gen. v. Life & Reserve Assn. 150 N. Y. 94, Reversing 32 Hun, 522.

Where the reserve fund is created for the benefit of members it is divisible among living members, and death claimants have no interest in it. People v. Life Union, 83 Hun, 693.

The fund deposited with the insurance department for the benefit of policy holders is subject to their claims alone, and not to those of general creditors. Falkenbach v. Patterson, 43 Ohio St. 350.

In BOSTON & A. R. Co. v. MERCANTILE TRUST & D. Co. it is held that if the company makes a deposit with the state treasurer as a guaranty for the payment of the policies issued by it, the fund will be applicable solely to the claims of policy holders, and the policy holders after exhausting this fund will be entitled to participate with the general creditors in the distribution of the general fund of the company.

So where a special fund has been set aside for the benefit of policy holders the salaries of employees are not charges against it, but merely against the general fund of the association.

In *Kentucky Mut. Secur. Fund Co. v. If the by-laws of an assessment life insurance company provide for a reserve fund the amount of which, above a certain sum, shall be applied to the payment of death claims under certain conditions the funds cannot, in case of insolvency, be applied to death claims generally. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Aberle, 19 App. Div. 79.

The guaranty fund of a mutual life insurance company organized under the California act of 1886 is liable only for the payment of debts due from the company to third persons dealing with it, and not for the payment of stockholders for moneys paid or contributed by them for the extinguishment of the obligations of the company for which, as stockholders, they were liable. Re California Mut. Massachusetts Safety Fund Assn. 147 Mass. 360, 1 L. R. A. 146.

Where the plan of the association contemplates both mutual and all-cash insurance, and provides for assessments and premium notes to pay losses, all on both kinds of policies may be provided for by an assessment on premium notes, but claims for unearned premium on all-cash policies must be paid from cash on hand and not from an assessment of the premium notes. And the two funds will be marshaled so that the cash will be left for payment of unearned premiums, while the fire losses will be paid out of assessments. *Clark v. Manufacturers' Mut. F. Ins. An assessment levied to meet a death claim before the dissolution of the corporation will not be impressed with a trust in favor of the holder of that claim if no portion of the assessment ever reaches the hands of the receiver and there is nothing in the contract appropriating the proceeds of an assessment to the payment of any particular claim. *People, Atty. b. Reinsurance.

The holder of the policy has no preferential claim on the amount of the reinsurance which the receiver obtained because of the loss. Herckenrath v. American Mut. Ins. Co. 8 Barb. Ch. 68.

But it has been held that a reinsurer, who has bought up before the commencement of insolvency proceedings the claims under the original policies, may set them off against the claim of the assignee of the original insurer to recover the amount due on the policies of reinsurance. In a case where a company reinsured its risks and attempted to transfer its mortuary fund to the reinsurer, the court held that after paying death losses accrued before the filing of the bill and the expenses of the suit, the fund should be divided and a portion turned over to the reinsurer equal to the proportionate share which the policy holders who accepted reinsurance bore to the whole amount, and the remainder divided among those policy holders who refuse to accept reinsurance in proportion to the assessments which had been paid by them. Insurance Commissioner v. Provident Aid Soc. 89 Mo. 413.

c. Stockholder's Liability.

Where the contract of the participating and non-participating policy holders each negated personal liability of the stockholders, and the latter class were made subject to prior claims, it was held that both classes were entitled to be paid out of the general fund of the society pari passu with general creditors, and that they could not compel the general creditors to leave the fund for them and seek the personal liability of the stockholders for reimbursement. And the court expressly decides that the participating policies do not make the holders partners in the concern so as to prevent their sharing in the assets as creditors. *Re English & Irish Church & University Assur. before us. The cases were elaborately and ably argued during the last October term of this court, and the preparation of the opinion was then assigned to the late Chief Judge Robinson. His lamented death occurring shortly afterwards without his having done more than hurriedly sketch an incomplete outline of some of the many questions involved, delayed a decision till now. We have had the benefit of Judge Robinson's notes, and will avail of them in this opinion.

The American Casualty Insurance & Security Company of Baltimore City was incorporated under the laws of Maryland in January 1890, and begun operation with a paid-up capital stock of $1,000,000. Its business embraced many and divers lines of insurance and indemnity. It was authorized to write and did write policies of insurance against accidents, against losses by railroads and street railways arising from injuries to property and persons, whether passengers or employees, or strangers; and it engaged in various other kinds of indemnities. In a little less than four years its whole paid-up capital, with the large sums which it had received in premiums,—except, however, the funds in court for distribution,—has been swept away by losses, and there are now outstanding liabilities due by it in a very large aggregate amount and to many thousand creditors. Becoming hopelessly insolvent, a bill was filed against it by some of its creditors, and an order was passed thereon on November 23, 1893, appointing receivers to take charge of its assets. The receivers now have in hand certain funds of the insolvent company, and the questions before us relate to the method of distributing the same. A portion of these funds is invested in certain securities which had been deposited by the company with the treasurer of Maryland, and the residue consists of moneys derived from other sources; and the question which is presented at the threshold is whether the proceeds of these securities, when sold, and the accrued and accruing interest thereon, constitute a special or trust fund applicable to a particular purpose,—to the payment of a particular class of creditors,—or are general assets, available for the settlement of all claims due by the insolvent company. All of the questions involved were passed upon by the court below in its order of August 8, 1895, from which order the pending appeals were taken.

After determining by this order what was the special and what the general fund, and after directing how the commissions, costs, and auditor's fees were to be paid, the circuit court ordered that the taxes claimed to be due to the mayor and city council of Baltimore were not properly chargeable upon the assets in the hands of the receivers, and, further, that there were three classes of creditors. The order then proceeded to define each of these classes, and prescribed rules for ascertaining the different values of the several policies held by them. Following, with a single exception, the paragraphs of the order appealed from, we come first to the question relating to the division of the funds into a special and a general fund. At the time of the appointment of the receivers there was standing in the name of the Honorable Spencer C. Jones, treasurer of Maryland,

Baltimore city stock of the par value of $200,000, which had been deposited with him by the company as a guaranty for the payment of the policies issued by it. On December 2, 1893, the receivers filed their petition in the circuit court, setting forth the facts in reference to the deposit of these securities, and praying the court to require Mr. Jones to transfer and deliver them to the petitioners, to the end that the same might be administered under the order and direction of the court. To this petition an answer was filed by Mr. Jones, asserting that these securities were held by him as a trust fund for the benefit of the policy holders of the company, and that they could not be applied to any other or different purpose. Presenting this view, he submitted to such decree as the court might deem proper to pass in the premises. Upon the petition and answer a decree or order was passed whereby Mr. Jones, the treasurer of Maryland, was directed to assign and deliver this Baltimore city stock to the receivers, to be held by them for the benefit of the policy holders, subject to the further orders of the court. Whether this fund is a special or trust fund, or, on the other hand, belongs to the general assets of the company, depends entirely upon the facts and circumstances under which it was deposited with Mr. Jones. If these are such as to create a trust in behalf of the policy holders, then the fund must be applied as the terms of the trust direct. In determining whether or not a trust has been created courts will take into consideration the situation and relations of the parties, the character of the property, and the purpose which the settlor had in view in making the declaration. No technical terms or expressions are needed. It is sufficient if the language used shows that the settlor intended to create a trust, and clearly points out the property, the beneficiary, and the disposition to be made of the property. 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 26, and the citations in notes 1, 2, 3. In this case the trust is alleged to have been created by an accident insurance and security company doing business in all parts of the country, and having its home office in this state. In many states of the Union insurance companies of every kind doing business in such states are required to deposit with some one of the state's officers a certain named sum of money or approved securities of a designated value, as a guaranty for the payment of losses sustained by the policy holders. And in this state every life insurance company is required to deposit with the treasurer of the state public securities of the value of $100,000 as a guaranty for the payment of the policies issued by the company. The American Casualty Company, it is insisted, however, is not a life insurance company, within the meaning of the Code of Public General Laws, and was not, therefore, obliged to make a deposit of any kind with the treasurer, and, further, that the treasurer, as such, had no lawful authority to accept such deposit. We need not stop to consider whether the deposit in this case was made by the company under the impression that it was a statutory requirement, or whether it was made voluntarily, with a view to strengthen its credit, and to give confidence to its policy holders of its ability to meet its obligations. The fact is, the company did make the deposit with Mr. Jones, and did take from him at the time the following certificate:

I, Spencer C. Jones, do hereby certify that I am treasurer of the state of Maryland, and that the American Casualty Insurance & Security Company of Baltimore City, a corporation chartered by said state and located in the city of Baltimore, has deposited in this office securities of the denominations and descriptions particularly set forth and described in the schedule signed by me and hereto annexed, amounting in par value to the sum of two hundred thousand dollars; and I further certify that said securities are now held by me, as such treasurer aforesaid, in my official capacity, on deposit as a guaranty for the payment of the policies of insurance issued by said company. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand at the city of Annapolis this twenty-eighth day of July, A. D. 1892.

Spencer C. Jones, Treasurer of Maryland.

The schedule annexed to this certificate is entitled, "Schedule setting forth the several denominations and a particular description of the stocks and other securities . . . held by me in trust for the policy holders of the American Casualty Insurance & Security Company of Baltimore City, as stated in the foregoing certificate." Here, then, is an express declaration by the trustee that this city stock was deposited with him by the company, and that it was held by him in trust as a guaranty for the payment of its policy holders; and this certificate was delivered by Mr. Jones to the company, and was in its possession at the time the receivers were appointed. An intention to create a trust of this kind may be inferred from conduct and circumstances without any express declaration. Allen v. Withrow, 110 U. S. 119, 28 L. ed. 90. In the case at bar we have the most explicit proof of the creation of the trust, for there is the unequivocal declaration of the trustee that he held the funds in trust; and there is a clear designation of the cestuis que trustent who are entitled under it. This is sufficient. Smith v. Darby, 29 Md. 228,—a case directly in point. The evidence of the trust, then, is conclusive, not only as to its creation, but also as to the objects and purpose for which, and the persons for whose benefit, it was established. And in reply to the objection that Mr. Jones has no right to accept the deposit as treasurer of the state it is sufficient to say that it is quite immaterial whether he held it in his official or in his individual capacity. If a trust existed, it will not be defeated by the inability of the trustee to act. A court of equity will never suffer a trust to fail for the want of a trustee. Nor can the action of Mr. Jones, in surrendering the fund under an order of a court of equity to the receivers, be held to have revoked the trust, or to have in any manner affected the rights of the cestuis que trustent thereunder. If he did not care to take upon himself the responsibility of distributing the fund among the parties entitled to it, he has the undoubted right either to invoke the aid of a court in its distribution, or upon the petition of the receivers to surrender it to the court, whose officers the receivers were. As to § 205, art. 16, of the Code, which requires trustees to whom any property has been conveyed or limited for the benefit of creditors, or to be sold for any purpose, to give bond, to be filed with the clerk of the court, it is only necessary to say that it has no application to a trust of this character. That section relates only to the assignment or conveyance of property for the purpose of sale, and it provides that no title shall pass to any trustee until such bond shall be filed and approved, and that no sale made by any such trustee without such bond shall be valid. For the reasons we have given, we agree with the court, below that the funds arising from the sale of the city stock and the interest accrued and accruing on that stock until sold must be treated as impressed with a trust, and must be applied solely to the payment of the claims of the policy holders, subject, however, to such prior or paramount liens upon it as will be hereinafter alluded to.

We have just said that we agree with the court below in that part of the order appealed from which defines the special and the general funds, but we cannot concur in that portion which provides that the general fund shall be set apart for the payment of all creditors "other than the claims of the policy holders." The policy holders, after they have exhausted the special fund, are entitled to participate, along with all other creditors, in the general fund. Passing by, for the moment, the intervening provisions of the order relative to the costs and commissions, and which will be disposed of later on, we come now to the claim filed by the mayor and city council of Baltimore for taxes. This appeal presents two questions: First, whether the tax levied by the municipality for the year 1893 upon the shares of stock of the company held by residents and nonresidents is a debt due and payable by the company or only collectible from the shareholders; and, secondly, if the tax be a debt due and payable by the company, is it a prior lien over the claims of all other creditors? These taxes cannot, of course, be considered a debt due by the company unless they are made so by statute, because the shares of stock are the property of the shareholder, and, under the Code, must be valued to him. But the Code further provides that the shares of stock of corporations owned by residents or nonresidents of the state shall be valued at their actual cash value, "but the tax assessed on such stock shall be levied and collected from said corporation, and may be charged to the account of such nonresident stockholders," and shall be a lien on the shares held by them respectively. Code, art. 81, § 138, as to nonresidents, and § 141, as to residents. The statute thus makes explicit provision for a certain and prompt method of collecting the taxes due upon shares of stock, whether held by residents or nonresidents, by imposing upon the corporation the obligation and the duty to pay the tax itself. In the case of shareholders not residing in the state, it is the only mode in which the state can reach their shares for taxation. First Nat. Bank v. Kentucky, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 353, 19 L. ed. 701. And when this court came to deal with the same question (American Coal Co. v. Allegheny County Comrs., 59 Md. 197) we held that, "the statute having created the duty and obligation to pay when the shares of stock are assessed to the individual owners, that duty and obligation on the part of the corporation may be enforced by a proper action at law." If these taxes are a debt due by the corporation, they are a debt due by it, and to be paid by it, regardless of any dividends or profits payable by the corporation to the shareholder, and out of which it might be reimbursed. New Orleans v. Houston, 119 U. S. 265, 80 L. ed. 411. Though this is conceded to be so while the corporation is a going concern, the contention is that when the company becomes insolvent, and its property has passed into hands of receivers, such taxes cannot be held to be a debt of the corporation for the payment of which its assets are liable. In reply to this it may be observed that the tax is, by the express terms of the statute, charged to and made payable by the corporation. If this be so, and if the tax was due at the time of the insolvency, then obviously the insolvency could in no manner affect the right of the city to demand payment out of the company's assets. By article 4, § 827, Code Pub. Local Laws, the city of Baltimore is empowered to levy taxes annually upon the assessable property of the city, and to provide by ordinance for the collection of the same. The city has provided by ordinance that taxes levied shall be paid on or before the 1st day of October in the year for which the levy was made, and that the collector may enforce the payment of the same after giving thirty days' notice. These taxes were consequently due when the company's assets passed into the hands of the receivers, and, being then due, the act of 1892 (chap. 518) directs they shall be paid and satisfied by the officer or person selling under judicial process the property, real or personal, upon which such taxes are payable. As these taxes were due and payable when the company became insolvent, they are, in our opinion, a prior lien upon the assets in the hands of the receivers, and must be paid out of the general fund, and if that should be insufficient, the balance must be paid out of the special fund.

This brings us to that part of the order of August 8, which classifies the various creditors, numbering in the vicinity of 4,000. The order divides these creditors into three groups: First, Clerks, servants, and employees to the extent of their salaries or wages due and unpaid for not exceeding three months prior to the appointment of the receivers. These creditors are allowed their claims for salaries and wages due and unpaid for not exceeding three months prior to November 23, 1893, as preferred claims, under art. 27, § 15, of the Code; and such allowance is free from objection, but is, in no contingency, payable out of the special fund. Second, Policy holders of the company. And, thirdly, all other creditors.

First. Who are included within the terms, "clerks, servants, and employees?" By the section of the Code to which reference has just above been made it is provided that "whenever any person or body corporate shall make an assignment, . . . or shall be adjudicated insolvent, . . . or shall have his, her, or its property or estate taken possession of by a receiver, . . . in the distribution of the property or estate of such person or body corporate all moneys due and owing from such person or body corporate for wages or salaries to clerks, servants, or employees contracted not more than three months anterior" to such assignment, insolvency, or receivership, "shall first be paid in full," etc. Under no circumstances can these claims be paid out of the special or trust fund. That trust, as we have said, was created for a particular purpose, and it was created as far back as 1892, long before any debt now due for wages or salaries, and entitled to priority under the statute, was contracted. The trust fund devoted to a special purpose cannot, therefore, be considered such property and estate belonging to the company at the time it became insolvent as would be liable for the satisfaction of these claims. In the case of Lewis v. Fisher, 80 Md. 134, 26 L. R. A. 2, we held that an attorney at law was not a clerk, servant, or employee, and we have now to determine whether an insurance adjuster is within these terms. What is the precise nature of the duties of an adjuster, the record does not disclose. But an adjuster was not, as we understand it, a person in the continuous employment of the company; that is, one who devoted his whole time and service uninterruptedly to the company. In his petition Mr. Phelps says he was employed as an adjuster in the state of Alabama at a salary of $1,000 and expenses. It was his duty and the duty of other adjusters, when an accident occurred, to ascertain all the facts and circumstances in connection with such accident,—how it happened, whether it was through the fault of the insured corporation, the nature and extent of the injury, and to make report thereof to the company. All this involved the exercise of judgment and discretion, and required some familiarity with the principles of law relating to the legal liability of the insured. Now, it is clear, we think, that the word "employee," as used in the statute, was intended to have a limited meaning, and that it cannot be applied in its broadest sense or as including everyone in the service or employment of a corporation or individual. The object of the statute was to provide for the payment of the wages and salaries due a certain class of persons to whom such wages or salaries were deemed always necessary for their support and maintenance. The statute first provides for the payment of the wages and salaries of clerks,—persons rendering mere clerical services,—then of servants or employees. The statute did not mean by "employees" persons rendering services of a higher degree than clerks. The duties of an adjuster being, as far as we are able to discover, of the character we have described, these officers, while in a general sense employees, cannot, by any fair rule of construction, be considered employees in the limited and restricted meaning of that term as used in the statute. To hold otherwise would result in the inclusion of a large class of persons in the service of a company or individual, as preferred creditors, though they are obviously not within the scope, purpose, and object of the Code, under which provision is made for a preference. But it was insisted that the conclusions reached by this court in Lewis v. Fisher, 80 Md. 139, 26 L. R. A. 2, are in conflict with the decision in Moore v. Heaney, 14 Md. 558. Such is not, however, the fact. Two entirely different statutes, relating to different subjects, were construed in the two cases. In Moore's Case the act of 1854 (chap. 23), relating to the exemption of the wages or hire of "a laborer or other employee" from attachment, was interpreted; while in Lewis's Case the identical statute now involved—the act of 1888 (chap. 883, art. 47, § 15, Code)—was before us. In Moore's Case this court gave a wide and liberal meaning to the word "employee," so as to bring as large a class of persons as possible within the provision which created an exemption in favor of laborers and other employees from the stringent terms of the attachment law, and from the equally harsh effects of an attachment levied by way of execution on wages. The act of 1854, creating an exemption in favor of a class of persons least able to protect themselves, and largely dependent on their wages for support, was given a liberal, and not a technically strict, construction, that might, perhaps, have been placed upon it. But the act of 1888 (art. 47, § 15, Code) was designed to create a preference in behalf of certain creditors in the distribution of an insolvent's assets, and to that extent it disturbs and destroys the equality among all creditors, which equality it was the obvious, if not declared, policy of the insolvent system to promote and preserve. Hence it was that, without questioning the decision in Moore's Case, which defined the words "other employee," as used in a statute relating to one subject, we gave in Lewis's Case to the term "employee" as used in another and a totally different statute, and as restricted by the context and by the words with which it was associated, a less comprehensive signification. The same word, used in different statutes relating to different subjects, does not necessarily have the same meaning. As observed by Pollock, C. B.; in Reg. v. Skeen, Bell, C. C. 97, "There is no word in the English language which does not admit of various interpretations."

We come now to the rules laid down in the order of August 8 for ascertaining the values of the various policies, and it will be necessary, for the sake of clearness, to make some general reference to the nature and character of these contracts of insurance or indemnity. No useful purpose could be served, but this opinion would be protracted far beyond all reasonable limits, if the provisions and stipulations contained in the various policies were set forth at large. We may say, however, that with suitable modifications and changes to adapt them to the particular character of loss designed to be covered in each case, and to adjust them to the sort of business in which the insured was engaged, all the policies purport to be either individual accident insurance policies, employees' indemnity bonds, or contracts under which, for a designated and agreed consideration, the company stipulated to indemnify the assured against liability for damages (not exceeding a specified amount) which might arise out of injuries to property or out of an injury to or the death of certain persons standing in various relations to the assured, these injuries, both to persons and to property, and these deaths, happening upon described premises, and being such as the assured might, in consequence of being responsible for their occurrence, be legally bound to answer for in damages. The object of the insurance, then, except in the case of a mere individual accident policy, was to provide means with which the assured might be reimbursed for any loss he had sustained if he were the holder of an employees' indemnity bond, or for any damages which he might lawfully be required to pay, and did in fact pay, by reason of such injuries or deaths as the policies covered, if he were the holder of the other classes of indemnity. The amount actually paid by the assured to the person injured, or to the representatives of the person killed, or to the owners of the property damaged or destroyed, settled and measured, within the limits specified in the policy, the extent of the insurer's liability. And while the mere liability of the assured to pay unascertained damages for any of the causes set forth in the contract of indemnity did not determine the precise amount which the insurer was bound to pay to reimburse the assured, it nevertheless fixed the insurer's liability to the assured under the contract. The happening of the event which subjected the insured to a claim for damages established the period when the correlative obligation of the insurer became complete and ceased to be contingent, except as to the amount to be paid. The liability of the insurer was thereby fixed, though the extent of that liability might, and in most cases must, necessarily, have been unascertained until a subsequent period.

Now, the insolvency of the company canceled outstanding policies of insurance for the future. Doone v. Millville Mut. Marine & F. Ins. Co. 43 N. J. Eq. 522. It is apparent that all casualties for which the various insured corporations and individuals holding the insolvent company's policies might be responsible must have happened either before or after the date of the insolvency. If the accidents which form the basis of the claims now made for indemnity happened after the insolvency was declared, then, inasmuch as the insolvency canceled the policies, there can be no claim under the policies; but as the company, by its insolvency, committed a breach of its contracts, the policy holders thereupon became entitled to damages for that breach, and these damages are the values of the destroyed policies. Mason v. Cronk, 125 N. Y. 503; People v. Security L. Ins. & A. Co. 78 N. Y. 125, 34 Am. Rep. 523. The policies being thus destroyed, of course all liability under them, from the date of the insolvency, for accidents occurring subsequently to the insolvency, ceased. Consequently, losses which happened after the insolvency, under policies in existence at the date of the insolvency, are not provable against the funds in the receivers' hands. While this is so, the values of the destroyed policies are provable, and, according to well-settled rules, these values consist solely of the unearned or returned premium. And this the circuit court decided. With respect to the other category,—the occurrence of the casualty before the date of the insolvency,—there are two contingencies presented: First, where the accident or injury insured against occurred, and the damages were ascertained and actually paid by the assured, before the appointment of the receivers; and, secondly, where the accident or injury insured against happened before the appointment of the receivers, but the amount recoverable from the assured remained unascertained and unpaid till after that date. As to the first of these contingencies, and in so far as the policy covers no other loss, there is and can be no dispute, and the court below properly held with respect to such policies that their value was a sum of money equal to the sum of the loss and the return of the unearned premium. But as to the second of the above contingencies we think the court was in error. With respect to the policies falling within this second contingency the order of August 8 declared: "But no cause of action nor action nor suit pending against the claimant, nor judgment nor decree against the claimant, unsatisfied before November 23, 1893, by the claimant, is a loss sustained by the claimant, nor can any claim be made for any judgment or decree rendered against the claimant and satisfied by him prior to November 23, 1893, except for the amount actually paid in settlement thereof." As already observed, these policies, in so far as they related to a period subsequent to the appointment of the receivers, and covered no antecedent loss or injury, were, by operation of law, annulled when the company became insolvent; but for the consequences of accidents or other casualties which occurred anterior to the insolvency, and which subjected the assured to a liability or a loss the amount of which remained undetermined or unsatisfied until after the receivers were appointed, the policies were unaffected, and the obligations arising under them were unimpaired by the company's insolvency. It is not solely because the insured has actually paid damages that the liability of the insurer to him is fixed, but it is because an accident or casualty or occurrence has happened for which he is responsible, and against the loss arising from which he has been indemnified, that the obligation of the insurer to reimburse him arises, though the precise amount to be paid by the insurer may depend for its ascertainment upon events happening after the insolvency. In other words the contingent liability of the insurer to reimburse the insured becomes a fixed liability the moment an event happens which fastens a responsibility on the insured, if that event be within the terms of the policy; but the amount of the liability continues to be contingent till the precise extent of the demand against the insured is established and paid. This contingency as to amount in no manner derogates from the fact that a liability for some amount has arisen and become fixed. In all instances, therefore, where the loss or injury happened before the insolvency, though the amount thereof was not ascertained and was not paid by the insured until after the insolvency, the holder of the policy will be entitled to prove for a sum equal to the loss or damages paid by him, plus the return premium, if any. What has been said above is sufficient to indicate that we also dissent from the third rule laid down by the circuit court for ascertaining the value of the class of policies in that rule referred to. When the liability became fixed prior to November 23, 1893, the insolvency on that date did not extinguish the assured's claim upon the assets, and did not put an end to the assured's right to indemnity. To the return premium in the cases described in this rule must be added what would have been payable under the policy after November 23 had no insolvency supervened. If by the fourth rule laid down in the order of August 8 it is meant that no loss arising from occurrences which happened after November 23 gives rise to a claim against the assets, we see no error in the rule; but if it means that no such claims exist if the accident or casualty occurred before November 23 and the amount was not ascertained until after that date, then, for the reasons we have heretofore given, we regard this fourth rule as erroneous.

There must of necessity be many outstanding and unascertained claims pending against holders of the company's policies, which claims may require some time for adjustment; but it is of great importance that the company's assets should be distributed at as early a date as practicable, and hence the settlement of its affairs ought not to be postponed to await the determination of every contingency on which its policy engagements are suspended. Carr v. Hamilton, 129 U. S. 256, 32 L. ed 670. To obviate all unreasonable delay, and yet to afford an opportunity to each policy holder who may be entitled to prove against the company's assets, it will be the duty of the circuit court to prescribe by an order that all claims be filed on or before the second Monday of June next, or otherwise be barred from participation in the distribution. This may result in cutting out some claims, but that will be unavoidable unless the distribution be postponed for a considerable space of time; and such a course would occasion unnecessary loss to those whose claims are in a condition to be proved. If by that date there should be outstanding claims not reduced to a certain basis, it will be the misfortune of the assured; but there is no way of obviating that misfortune. May, Ins. § 594a. By a prior clause of the order of August 8 it was provided "that each owner and holder of, or person having any lawful claim upon, any of said classes of insurance policies, or any similar policy of the defendant corporation, issued prior to November 23, 1893, for a period to extend beyond said date, who duly paid the premium thereon for the entire period or any portion of it extending after November 23, 1893, as agreed between the policy holders and the said company, is entitled to claim upon the value thereof on November 23, 1893, and to receive dividends upon such value out of the net special fund." If the design of this provision was to exclude all policies which did not cover a period of time extending beyond November 23, 1893, the provision is obviously erroneous. Such an exclusion would cut out a claim matured and perfected during the life of the policy whose limit of duration terminated the day before the appointment of the receivers, and under which nothing remained to be done by the insurance company but to reimburse the insured. In respect to that part of the order which charges the special fund with the payment of costs and expenses that the general fund may be insufficient to meet, it is only necessary to say this special fund, being a trust fund devoted to a particular and specified purpose, cannot be diverted therefrom, or applied to any other or different object; and, except in so far as it is liable for the payment of the taxes which are paramount to all other claims, it must be distributed to the policy holders for whom it was set apart, and can be charged with no portion of the costs and commissions incurred in administering a totally distinct fund.

But two questions more remain to be considered. One is of considerable interest. In the argument at the bar it was insisted with great earnestness and marked ability that all policies issued by the casualty and indemnity company to carriers of passengers, indemnifying the carriers against their liability for injuries to persons, are void because contrary to public policy. The contention is that, as the law exacts from the carrier of passengers the exercise of the utmost care and diligence which human foresight can use to avoid an injury, any contract which relieves the carrier of his duty to the public in this regard, or lessens his liability for all or any of the wilful, criminal, and negligent acts of his employees or his managers and himself, is detrimental to the interests of the public as understood by the courts at this time, and is therefore repugnant to public policy. No exact definition of public policy has ever been given or can be found. Speaking generally, the principle which holds that no one can lawfully do that which has a tendency to be injurious to the public, or against the public good, may be termed the policy of the law or public policy in relation to the administration of the law. 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 565. In Richardson v. Mellish, 2 Bing. 229, Mr. Justice Burrough pointedly observed: "I, for one, protest . . . against arguing too strongly upon public policy;—it is a very unruly horse, and when once you get astride it you never know where it will carry you. It may lead you from the sound law. It is never argued at all but when all other points fail." It is one thing at one time, another thing at another time, and its very vagueness shows that it does not admit of exact or precise definition, and that it is not easily explained. "If that statement requires authority," said Kekewich, J., in Davies v. Davies, L. R. 36 Ch. Div. 364, when discussing public policy as affecting contracts in restraint of trade, "turn to Egerton v. Earl Brownlow, 4 H. L. Cas. 1, and consult the arguments of counsel and the opinions of judges covering the whole subject. . . . One thing I take to be clear, and it is this: that public policy is a variable quantity; that it must vary, and does vary, with the habits, capacities, and opportunities of the public; that it cannot have been the same when Chief Justice Tindal decided Horner v. Graves, 7 Bing. 735, in 1831, as it was when Chief Justice Parker decided Mitchel v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181, in 1711; that it must have changed, and did change, between 1831 and 1869, when Vice Chancellor James decided Leather Cloth Co. v. Lonsont, L. R. 9 Eq. 845; and if there had not been further change before Lord Justice Fry decided Rou- illon v. Roussillon, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 351, in 1880, it must have occurred ere now." The wisdom and correctness of these observations are strikingly illustrated in the development and change and expansion of the law from the crude, rigorous, and harsh exactions of past centuries to the liberal, enlightened, and advanced policy of to-day in relation to the liability of a carrier of goods, his right to restrict that liability by contract, and to insure against loss and injury the property intrusted to him, and of which he himself is, under the law, an insurer. By the common law the carrier was treated as an insurer, and was bound to keep and carry safely all goods consigned to his care, and he was liable for all losses, and in all events, except for losses caused by the act of God and the King's enemies. Chitty, Carr. 349; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Green, 25 Md. 89. This rule of responsibility did not have its origin in contract, but was founded on grounds of public policy. "For though," said Lord Holt in Cogge v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909, "the force be never so great, as if an irresistible multitude of people should rob him, nevertheless he is chargeable. And this is a politic establishment, contrived by the policy of the law for the safety of all persons the necessity of whose affairs obliges them to trust these sorts of persons, that they may be safe in their ways of dealing; for else these carriers might have an opportunity of undoing all persons that had any dealings with them, by combining with thieves, etc., and yet doing it in such a clandestine manner as would not be possible to be discovered." Afterwards, when the better administration of the law afforded greater protection to the carrier against the depredations of thieves, and had lessened the opportunities for fraud and collusion, the strict rule of the common law was measurably relaxed, and the carrier was permitted to limit his responsibility by special contract where the limitations were just and reasonable. But even this departure was of gradual development, for in Barney v. Prentiss, 4 Harr. & J. 317, 7 Am. Dec. 870, the court declined to express an opinion on the carrier's right to restrict his liability; but in Brahme v. Dinamore, 25 Md. 828, the right was distinctly recognized, and is undoubtedly now the law. New York O. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 684; McCoy v. Erie & W. Transp. Co. 43 Md. 498. The conclusions reached in the carefully considered and exceedingly able opinion delivered in Lockwood's Case, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 684, were: First, that a common carrier cannot lawfully stipulate for exemption from responsibility where such exemption is not just and reasonable in the eye of the law; secondly, that it is not just and reasonable, in the eye of the law, for a common carrier to stipulate for exemption from responsibility for the negligence of himself or his servants; thirdly, that these rules apply both to carriers of goods and carriers of passengers for hire, and with special force to the latter. While the carrier will not be permitted by contract or otherwise to exempt himself from liability for losses caused by his own negligence or the negligence of his servants, there is no reason of public policy which prohibits him from contracting with a third person for insurance against these very same losses. Consequently he may by insurance indemnify himself against loss of or injury to property intrusted to his care, even where the loss or injury is caused by his own or his servants' negligence. This was decided in Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Erie & W. Transp. Co. 117 U. S. 312, 29 L. ed. 873, and the ground upon which the decision was based was that such insurance did not diminish the carrier's own responsibility to the owner of the goods, but increased the means of meeting that responsibility. Notwithstanding such insurance, the carrier remains liable to the owner or shipper of the goods, and by insuring them he merely contracts, as in every other instance of a reinsurance, with someone else for reimbursement for such loss. The doctrine announced in the Phoenix Ins. Co.'s Case, 117 U. S. 312, 29 L. ed. 873, was affirmed in California Ins. Co. v. Union Compress Co. 133 U. S. 387, 33 L. ed. 730, and is the settled law of the land. A reasonable restriction by contract of his common law liability and an insurance by the carrier of goods against loss are recognized by the law, and are not in contravention of its policy to-day, whatever that policy might have been heretofore. It is obvious that a carrier of passengers cannot by contract restrict, diminish, or limit that obligation to the public or that duty to the passenger which requires the exercise of the highest degree of care and diligence on his part. A contract which stipulates for or agrees to such relaxation, and therefore contemplates immunity from the carrier's own negligence, would be utterly void; precisely as would a contract purporting to relieve a carrier of goods from liability for losses occasioned by his own or his servant's negligence. But the policies before us are not contracts of that character. Neither in express terms nor by implication do they profess or purport to abridge in any way the carrier's common-law liability for injuries to passengers, employees, or strangers. These policies leave that liability precisely where, and as complete as, it was before they were written. They contain no provision impugning or questioning in the slightest degree the full measure of that responsibility. It is perfectly manifest, therefore, that they are not in terms contracts restricting or attempting to restrict the carrier's conceded liability; and, if they contravene public policy at all, it must and can only be incidentally and indirectly. This is all that can be imputed to them. But they are, it is alleged, repugnant to public policy because by furnishing the carrier with a fund with which to reimburse himself for losses caused by his own negligence their inevitable tendency or effect is to induce less vigilance or to promote greater carelessness on the part of the carrier. Precisely the same reasoning would invalidate, as repugnant to public policy, every species of fire and marine insurance. To the extent that a fire insurance policy affords an individual protection against loss, to exactly the same extent may it be said the assured will become indifferent in guarding against casualties from fire. And in so far as a carrier may have a policy covering goods and insuring them for his own benefit against losses arising from his or his servant's negligence, just so far will he be either tempted to be negligent, or become indifferent as to vigilance. But in neither instance can it be said that, because a temptation to be negligent may possibly result from the possession of an insurance policy, the contract of insurance necessarily begets negligence, or conflicts with public policy. Nor can we assume as an unvarying rule, of which judicial notice will be taken, that a carrier of passengers, who has secured an indemnity to reimburse himself for losses which his own negligence may produce, will, merely because and solely in consequence of having such indemnity—which at best is but limited and partial—necessarily disregard the duty to exercise the highest degree of care. And unless it be assumed as a postulate that the mere possession of an indemnity will of itself necessarily and invariably produce negligence, it does not logically follow that such a policy or indemnity is even incidentally or indirectly repugnant to public policy. The indemnity in no way affects the liability of the carrier to the person injured. The utmost that it does, precisely as in the case of a carrier of goods, is to afford him a fund out of which he may be reimbursed, and that too, perhaps, but partially; for in all these policies the liability of the insurer is always limited, and confined to a specifically designated sum. The compensation to an individual, whether passenger, employee, or stranger, is, after all, a money compensation, and, though the life or limb of a person may be, and most certainly is, of greater intrinsic value than goods and chattels, still the law knows of no other means of making compensation or approximate compensation in either instance than by the assessment of damages in dollars and cents. If in the development and progress of the law the ancient rules have been relaxed in the case of a carrier of goods so as to enable him to insure against his own negligence when the result of the insurance is to furnish him the means to make compensation to the owner or shipper of goods, we see no valid reason for holding that the law, in its advance to conform to the "habits," capacities, and opportunities of the public, has not reached the stage of allowing a carrier of passengers, not to contract for a restriction of his original liability, but to purchase from a third party an indemnity fund with which to make more certain his ability to respond in damages for personal injuries caused by his carelessness and neglect. As public policy is a varying quantity, changing with the habits of the people, there is nothing in it, as it exists at this day, to warrant us in saying these policies infringe it. But how can an insurance or indemnity of this kind be contrary to that vague, indefinite, and "variable quantity" called "public policy," when no restriction is placed on the carrier's liability or duty to the public or to the individual, and no attempt is made in the contract of indemnity to interfere with the relations between the carrier and the public, or the carrier and the individual, as those relations existed under the law prior to the writing of the policy? We have said the only suggestion in answer to this inquiry is that a tendency to relax the carrier's vigilance necessarily results from the fact that under the policy a fund is provided out of which he may be reimbursed the sums he may be obliged to pay as penalties occasioned by his own negligence. But this not only does not meet the objection that no such relaxation of care and diligence is stipulated for in the contract of insurance, or in any contract between the carrier and the passenger or other individual, but it lays out of view a consideration of which the most casual observer cannot fail to take note, and it is this: The carrier will, from motives of self-interest, if from none other, endeavor to reduce the sum total of his insurance to a minimum figure, and thereby diminish the amount of the annual premium payable therefor, while the aggregate of insurance which he may be able to procure, as well as the rate charged him for it, will always depend in a large measure, if not entirely, upon the prudence, care, and skill with which his affairs are managed and conducted. Such a carrier has, consequently, exactly the same motive or incentive to protect the public and the individual from injury that he would have if he should become his own insurer, or were a carrier of goods, and therefore the insurer of them. Stretching the doctrine of public policy to the extent of striking down these policies would, in the language of Mr. Justice Burrough, "lead you from the sound law." And as, according to the same learned justice, this doctrine "is never argued at all but where all other points fail," it would be of doubtful expediency to invoke it where the only apparent consequence of obtaining such insurance would be, not to diminish the carrier's own responsibility, but rather to increase his means of meeting that responsibility. The fallacy of the objection urged against the validity of these policies lies in the failure to distinguish between a contract which, on the one hand, stipulates with the passenger for immunity on the part of the carrier from the consequences of the latter's breach of duty, and a contract whereby, on the other hand, the carrier, while in no way diminishing that liability, merely agrees with a third person to procure from the latter a fund out of which to pay, perhaps the whole, but at least a portion, of the damages which he may be chargeable with on account of his failure to observe and discharge his duty. As remarked by Mr. Justice Story in Ocean Ins. Co. v. Polleys, 38 U. S. 18 Pet. 164, 10 L. ed. 108: "We all know that there are cases where a contract may be valid notwithstanding it is remotely connected with an independent illegal transaction, which, however, it is not designed to aid or promote." Now, it is perfectly obvious the casualty company never intended, by writing policies for carriers of persons, to aid or promote carelessness or negligence on the part of the assured. Its manifest interest to avoid the payment of heavy amounts to reimburse the assured for the damages which might be recovered in consequence of such negligence was alone sufficient to exclude the inference that by writing these policies its purpose was to aid or promote negligent, and therefore illegal, conduct on the part of the carrier; and, though its liability might depend on just such negligence, its contract was not made to promote it; nor did the underwriter, directly or indirectly, stipulate for any breach of duty by the carrier towards the public or the individual. The thing done by the insured might subject him to an action for damages because wrongfully done, but the distinct and independent contract to partially reimburse him those same damages was in no respect designed to aid, assist, or advance any such illegal act. In the case last above cited from 18 Pet. a policy of insurance written upon a schooner for the term of one year was the cause of action. The schooner was totally lost by the perils of the sea while the policy was in force. The insurance company insisted that the schooner, on the voyage on which she was lost, was sailing under circumstances rendering her liable to forfeiture for a violation of the laws of the United States; and that therefore a policy on a vessel pursuing such a voyage was not valid, or legal and binding. The supreme court said: "The objection, then, as insisted on by the counsel for the insurance company, involved two distinct propositions. The first was that the schooner was sailing on the voyage under circumstances which rendered her liable to forfeiture. The second was that the policy on her was therefore void. Now, the first might have been most fully admitted by the court, and yet the second have been denied, upon the ground that the policy was a lawful contract in itself, and only remotely connected with the illegal use of the certificate of registry, and in no respect designed to aid, assist, or advance any such illegal purpose." We see no reason to hold that these policies are void because against public policy.

There is but one other question to be considered, and that relates to the claim of the West End Street Railway, one of the appellants. A policy was taken out by this company for a year expiring August 1, 1892. It contained a provision allowing the insured to renew, at its option, the same policy for three years from the above date. The insured gave notice of its intention to claim, and it did claim, an extension or renewal of the policy under the option, but the insurer refused to renew. The West End Company claims that the policy is still in force. To this we do not assent. If the insured intended to rely on the contract, it was its duty to have paid the premium, or at least to have tendered the premium and demanded a renewal. Dungan v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 46 Md. 493. It did neither, and the policy thereupon ceased to be effective.

We think no interest should be allowed on the claim for taxes, or on any of the other claims filed against the insolvent company. While not precisely analogous, the case of Hutchinson v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. 158 Mass. 143, 10 L. R. A. 558, supports this conclusion. It is not easy, if indeed it be possible, to place upon a consistent basis many of the decisions in which interest has been allowed or disallowed. Perhaps some of the numerous claims might, in strictness, be entitled to an allowance of interest under ordinary circumstances, but it does not appear that the amounts asserted to be due have been wrongfully withheld by the casualty company. The failure to pay, as far as we can see, has been the result of the company's insolvency. A penalty or damages in the way of interest ought not, therefore, to be added to the sums actually due.

It results from what we have said that the order of August 8, 1895, will be affirmed in part and reversed in part, and the causes, except those that will be dismissed, must be remanded to the end that another order may be passed conforming to this opinion.

Order affirmed in part, and reversed in part, and causes remanded to the end that another order may be passed in conformity to this opinion; one half the costs in all the cases to be paid out of the general fund, the other half to be paid out of the special fund.

(.....Md.....)

1. A transfer of stock in a national bank of another state, made in Maryland to a married woman, who is competent by the law of that state to be a stockholder, is valid, irrespective of the law of the state in which the bank is situated.

2. One who holds stock as the self-appointed attorney or trustee of an infant, without anything on the books of the corporation to show that the holder is not the actual and beneficial owner, is liable as a stockholder.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Kent County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce defendant's statutory liability as a stockholder of an insolvent national bank. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James A. Pearce, for appellant:

The state courts had jurisdiction.

Clostin v. Houseman, 98 U. S. 180, 23 L. ed. 833; Ordway v. Central Nat. Bank, 47 Md. 217, 28 Am. Rep. 455.

The remedy is at law, and not in equity, in this case.

Kennedy v. Gibson, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 498, 19 L. ed. 476.

The order of the controller as to the assessment is conclusive, and a certified copy thereof is the only evidence required.

Kennedy v. Gibson, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 498, 19 L. ed. 476; Germania Nat. Bank v. Case, 99 U. S. 628, 25 L. ed. 448; Adams v. Johnson ("Bowden v. Johnson"), 107 U. S. 251, 27 L. ed. 386.

The defendant in this case is liable to the assessment made, and the enforcement of his personal liability is the only recourse of the plaintiff in this case.

Married women have been held liable because of the law of the place authorizing them to become so.

Bundy v. Cocks, 123 U. S. 185, 32 L. ed. 397; Foster v. Chase, 75 Fed. Rep. 797.

In all of the cases in which the liability of a married woman has been sustained, not one can be found in which she was not the beneficial owner of the stock.

Mrs. Urie, being by the express terms of the assignment to her, and of the certificate thereafter issued to her, a trustee for another, would have brought herself directly within the exemption from personal liability secured by § 5152 to trustees, had she been sued to recover this assessment.

A married woman may be a trustee.

Perry, Tr. § 50; Bouldin v. Reynolds, 58 Md. 495.

A married woman cannot bind herself personally in dealing with the trust estate. She may, as agent, bind one who is competent to authorize and has authorized her to act for him, but would not be liable to third parties with whom she dealt in her own name.

14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 681; Attery v. Griffin, L. R. 6 Eq. 606.

Capital stock, and especially unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock, constitute a trust fund for the benefit of the creditors of the corporation.

Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 109; Sawyer v. Hoag, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 610, 21 L. ed. 781.

The liability to assessment to the full par value of the stock is as much a part of the "unpaid subscription" as is the original par value of the stock, till it is fully paid, and is in fact a part of the original subscription, the liability being an inherent part of such subscription.

Davis v. First Baptist Soc. 44 Conn. 582, 2 Browne, Nat. Bank Cas. 110; Rider v. Morrison, 54 Md. 429.

The assignment is not effective in law to terminate defendant's personal liability.

Johnson v. Laflin, 5 Dill. 65; Germania Nat. Bank v. Case, 99 U. S. 628, 25 L. ed. 448; Adams v. Johnson ("Bowden v. Johnson"), 107 U. S. 251, 27 L. ed. 386; Castleman v. Holmes, 4 J. J. Messrs. Charles F. Harley and John D. Urie, for appellee:

Transfers of stock in national bank associations are not governed by different rules from those which are ordinarily applied to the transfers or shares in other corporate bodies.

Johnston v. Laflin, 103 U. S. 800, 26 L. ed. 532.

The use of the word "trustee" in this connection is entirely erroneous.

Anderson, Law Dict. p. 1037; Davis v. First Baptist Soc. 44 Conn. 582.

The stock stands, not in the name of an infant, but in the name of an adult, a married woman, and she is liable under the national bank act, to assessment.

Even if we consider Lillian Urie, as attorney or agent of M. L. Urie, her infant child, she had a perfect legal right to act as such agent, even in dealings with her husband, the defendant, with all the liabilities and responsibilities of other agents.

Story, Agency, § 7; Mechem, Agency, § 61; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 947.

Lillian Urie has all the rights and all the liabilities of a feme sole in the premises; and the liability of an agent purchasing or holding for an infant is incontrovertible.

Story, Agency, 9th ed. § 264; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1122; Cook, Stock & Stockholders, 8d ed. § 67.

In either view of the case, whether as an individual holder of the stock as appears by the stock book of the bank, or as agent as appears by the certificate issued to her, Lillian Urie is liable and alone liable for the assessment on this stock.

The fact that the bank accepted the transfer, canceled the certificate formerly held by the defendant, and entered the name of Lillian Urie as the personal holder of this stock on the books of the bank, and the demand of the receiver, who represents the bank, on her for the assessment, thus recognizing her personal responsibility therefor, together with the long lapse of time since the transfer of the stock, estops the receiver from any action against the defendant.

Fowler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by this appeal is whether a married woman residing in this state is capable of holding stock in a national bank located and doing business in the state of Texas, and, if so, whether she is liable as such stockholder, under the personal liability provisions of § 5152 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. Whatever difficulty may surround this question arises, we think, more from the manner in which it is presented in this case, than from any other cause, for it can hardly be supposed that at this day, when by the law of most all the states, a married woman may contract as a feme sole in respect to her separate estate, she is without power to subscribe for or become the transferee of the stock of a national bank.

The learned author of Cook on Stock, Stockholders, and Corporation Law (§ 250) expresses the opinion that, without doubt, a married woman may become the transferee of such stock. Certainly a feme sole may be such a stockholder, and would undoubtedly be subject to all the personal liabilities imposed by § 5152. And, if this be so, what would be the effect of her marriage upon her right to hold bank stock? Would she be any the less a stockholder after than before her marriage? There is certainly nothing in the acts of Congress which can be held to exclude married women from the privilege of owning this class of valuable personal property.

The question before us is thus presented: It appears from the agreed statement of facts that in April, 1891, the defendant, John D. Urie, purchased for the benefit of his infant daughter (a child four years old) ten shares of the capital stock of the City National Bank of Quannah, and that his wife requested the certificate therefor should be placed in her name, which was accordingly done. The bank having called upon Mrs. Urie to pay into its surplus $250, she was unable to do so, and the defendant (her husband) agreed to, and did, furnish the money the bank had called for, provided the stock in question should be transferred to him, to be held for the benefit of their infant child, as Mrs. Urie had held it in the first instance. The original certificate which had been issued to her was accordingly surrendered, and another was issued to the defendant, in February, 1892, which he subsequently transferred to her at her request and in consideration of $123.10 paid to him by her. It is admitted that this transfer is bona fide and for value. The assignment by the defendant was to his wife as attorney, and the certificate was so drawn, but it appears by the agreed statement of facts that the stock was issued to and held by Mrs. Urie personally, as shown by the stub of the stock book. The bank having become insolvent, a receiver was duly appointed, who has instituted suits against the stockholders of said bank to enforce the personal liability provided by § 5152. But instead of suing Mrs. Urie, who, according to the books of the bank, is the holder of the stock, suit has been brought against her husband, upon the theory that his transfer of the stock to her is void, not, however, by reason of any fraud or irregularity in the transfer, but upon the sole ground that Mrs. Urie, being a married woman, is incapable of being a stockholder. Such a proposition at first blush would seem to be altogether untenable, nor do we think this first impression has been overcome by any argument we have heard. It is too late at this date to regulate the property rights of married women by the ancient common law of England. That has been abrogated in this country almost universally, and, as Mr. Cook says, married women may doubtless in all the states become transferees of bank stock, and the learned counsel for the appellant is forced to admit that, if the law as thus laid down is to prevail, his proposition must fail.

If the question before us had arisen out of a contract conceded to be a Maryland contract, we think there could not have been any doubt as to the legality of Mrs. Urie's holding, for under our statute all the property, real and personal, belonging to a woman at the time of her marriage, and all property which she may acquire by purchase, gift, grant, devise, bequest, descent, or in course of distribution, she shall hold for her separate use, etc. There can be no doubt, therefore, that where a married woman is in possession of bank stock before she is married, or which after marriage came to her, as provided by the statute, she would hold it as her separate property, as provided by the Code. The fact that her power of disposition may be limited makes her none the less a stockholder. But it is said the contract is not a Maryland contract, but is a contract made in Texas, and that therefore the rights of the parties must be determined by the law of the latter state. And this contention is based upon the proposition that a subscription made in one state to capital stock of a corporation which exists in and carries on its business in another state is a contract to be performed in the latter state, and is governed by the laws of that state. While this general proposition may be conceded, yet it must be remembered that the contract we are considering is not the contract of subscription, but the contract by which the defendant transferred to his wife the stock already subscribed for by her. It would seem to follow, if the contention of the appellant be correct, namely, that Mrs. Urie has no legal capacity to subscribe for or hold the stock, that the original contract of subscription which was made by her and in her own name, although the money was furnished by her husband, was null and void; and therefore no liability ever arose under § 5152, and hence the defendant never incurred any liability thereunder, unless the mere fact that he furnished the money to pay for the stock would make him so liable; and this cannot be, because the liability under § 5152 attaches only to persons who are stockholders either in their own right or in some representative capacity, not exempted by the express terms of that section. But, be this as it may, we have already said the question now before us is the validity of transfer of the stock by the defendant to his wife. By means of this contract of transfer which was made in this state by two citizens of this state, and therefore to be governed by the laws of this state, the defendant, in good faith and for value, assigned, and, we think, had a right (no creditor of his objecting) to thus assign it. The contract was complete when the transfer was made, and his ownership of the stock, which is conceded, carried with it, according to the weight of authority of the later decisions, the right to make the transfer, because stock is characterized by the same features as other forms of personal property. Nor was it essential to the transferee's equitable title that she should have a new certificate issued to her. It was said by Davis, J., in the leading case of New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 81, "that the nonproduction and surrender of the certificate at the time of the transfer is not fatal to the title of the transferee. It is only essential to the safety of the corporation." And in Baltimore City Pass. R. Co. v. Sewell, 35 Md. 239, 6 Am. Rep. 402, it is said that when shares are assigned, although not made on the books of the corporation, title passes to the assignee.

In later cases—Baltimore Relort & F. Brick Co. v. Mali, 65 Md. 96, 97, 57 Am. Rep. 304; Swift v. Smith, 65 Md. 435, 57 Am. Rep. 336; and Noble v. Turner, 69 Md. 524.—it was held that such a title is an equitable title, giving to the transferee the right to enforce actual entry of the transfer upon the books of the corporation, and thus to convert the equitable into a legal title. We conclude, therefore, that by virtue of the transfer in Maryland, and without regard to the laws of Texas, Mrs. Urie became the equitable and real holder of the stock in question; and, if this be so, no question as to her powers of disposition, or as to whether she is or is not capable under the laws of Texas to make contracts, can arise in this case, for the liability of a stockholder arises not under any law of Texas, which it is contended has not been proved in this case, but under the act of Congress. And the contracts which it is claimed she is liable on are not her contracts, but the contracts of the bank. Witters v. Soules, 35 Fed. Rep. 641; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5152. The right to be a stockholder is given to her by the law of the state where she resides, and her rights and liabilities, as such, are provided by the acts of Congress. But if we could, without proof, say what is the law of Texas, it would be found, upon this question, the same substantially as ours. "All property, both real and personal, of the wife, owned or claimed by her before marriage, and that acquired afterwards by gift, devise or descent, . . . shall be the separate property of the wife." Tex. Rev. Stat. art. 2367.

The case of Keyser v. Hitz, 133 U. S. 151, 83 L. ed. 533, was relied on by the defendant to show that his wife, and not he, was the real holder of the stock in question, and that, therefore, she was the proper defendant in this suit. Assuming that she had a right to hold the stock under our state law, this case is, we think, conclusive authority upon the controlling question before us. In delivering the opinion of the court, Harlan, J., said: "The only persons holding shares of national bank stock, whom the statute exempts from this personal responsibility, are executors, administrators, guardians, or trustees. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5152. It is not for the courts, by mere construction, to recognize an exemption which Congress has not given. The hardship that may result where the ownership of national bank stock by a married woman is subject to the common law rights of the husband, in respect to its alienation, cannot control the interpretation of the statute. Such considerations are more properly for the legislative department." In Re Reciprocity Bank, 23 N. Y. 15, Comstock, J., expressed the same view, and said that the law in regard to the imposition of personal liability of stockholders ought to be so construed as to maintain it in its integrity, and that to hold married women exempt from its provisions would go far to defeat its policy.

The appellant, however, contended that, admitting that Mrs. Urie was authorized to hold the stock beneficially, she did not so hold it, but in fact held it as attorney, agent, trustee, or in some representative capacity. But it is clear from the evidence that she either holds as self-appointed attorney or trustee for an infant of tender years, for an undisclosed principal, as appears by the certificate, or personally and beneficially, as appears by the stub of the stock book of the bank. In neither event do we think she can evade the personal liability of a stockholder. If persons were allowed to subscribe for stock in a national bank or in any other corporation where a personal liability attaches, either as attorney for an unnamed principal, as self-appointed trustee for some unnamed cetui que trust, or as attorney for an unnamed infant of tender years, and, when called upon to pay the debts of the bank to the extent of the stock so subscribed, could escape by simply declaring that they represented in some capacity those who are legally or otherwise incapacitated, the law would be a dead letter, and the creditors of these associations, which are found in great numbers in every state, would be deprived of the only certain means provided by law for the payment of their claims. But in addition to this, it is well settled upon authority that one assuming to act as Mrs. Urie has acted becomes personally bound. The infant not being liable, liability attaches to the person who makes the subscription; and, if that person has transferred the stock to one capable of taking and holding it, the liability passes to the latter. Cook, Stock, Stockholders, & Corp. Law, § 67.

The only safe rule on this subject is that, when stock is held in a representative capacity, it should be noted on the stock book of the bank; and, if a person appears there as absolute owner of the stock, he will not generally be permitted to deny it. If he claims to be trustee, and does not disclose it, he is guilty of laches, for which others should not suffer. The settlement of the affairs of an insolvent bank would be rendered a matter of great expense and delay if persons who appeared on the books of the bank as individual stockholders were permitted to relieve themselves by proving that they held the stock in a representative capacity. Davis v. Weed, 44 Conn. 569, 2 Browne, Nat. Bank Cas. 115; Davis v. First Baptist Soc., 44 Conn. 582, 2 Browne, Nat. Bank Cas. 110. But this court has disposed of this question in the same way in Magruder v. Colston, 44 Md. 356, 22 Am. Rep. 47. Thus, "if creditors must look beyond the legal title, as exhibited by the books of the bank, they can never know against whom to proceed." Mrs. Urie, as we have seen, was, according to the books of the appellant bank, the absolute owner of the stock. Having concluded that Mrs. Urie is the holder of the stock in question, it follows that the plaintiff's prayers were properly refused. The rulings of the court upon the defendant's prayers and upon the demurrer to his plea are not before us.

Judgment affirmed.

A PPEAL by defendants from an order of the District Court for Polk County appointing a receiver over property of the Pierce-Wallace Publishing Company. Reversed.

Statement by Deemer, J.:

Suit in equity for the appointment of a receiver of a corporation known as the Pierce-Wallace Publishing Company, for the winding up of its affairs, and for general equitable relief. The lower court ordered the appointment of a receiver for 118 shares of the capital stock of a corporation known as the Homestead Company, owned by the Pierce-Wallace Publishing Company, and directed him to attend the meetings of the stockholders in the Homestead Company, and vote the stock for the Pierce-Wallace Company, and to care for and to preserve the said stock under the orders and direction of the court in the premises. Defendants appeal.

Messrs. Guernsey & Bailey, for appellants:

A court of equity has no inherent jurisdiction to appoint a receiver for a private corporation.

Our statutes with reference to the appointment of receivers, applicable alike to corporations and natural persons, are Iowa Code, § 2903, McClain's Code of 1888, § 4113.

In order to warrant the appointment of a receiver there must exist—

1. A civil action or proceeding pending.
2. There must be some specific property in controversy, or, to use the language of the statute, "property which is the subject of the controversy."
3. The application must be made by a party to such suit.
4. In his application he must show that he has a probable right to, or interest in, the property in controversy, and "that such property or its rents or profits are in danger of being lost or materially injured or impaired" pending the disposition of the main controversy.
5. The receiver may be appointed "to take charge of and control such property" under the court's direction "during the pendency of the action."

The plaintiff has no title to the property in controversy; he has not a right to its possession; he has not a lien upon it; he has not a lien upon the proceeds of it; he cannot sell it; as a stockholder in the Pierce-Wallace Publishing Company he owns his stock in that company.

If an injury were threatened this stock, and the evidence absolutely fails to show it, Wallace, as a stockholder in the Pierce-Wallace Publishing Company, could not maintain a suit until he had first applied to the corporation and requested it to do it, and the corporation under circumstances tantamount to fraud and bad faith had refused. A mere refusal would not be enough. The element of fraud or bad faith or such circumstances as would throw doubt upon the good faith of the decision of the corporate authorities not to act must be involved.

The record discloses no cause of action over which the court had jurisdiction.

The question presented is whether a court of equity has jurisdiction on the petition of a private individual to dissolve a corporation.

A court of equity has no such jurisdiction.

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Pierce-Wallace Publishing Company is a corporation organized under the laws of this state, having its principal place of business in the city of Des Moines. The stock is owned in equal shares by plaintiff and the defendant J. M. Pierce, and these parties are the sole directors and officers of the corporation; Pierce being the president and business manager, and Wallace the secretary and treasurer and editor. The corporation owns 118 shares of the capital stock of another corporation known as the Homestead Company, and also owns and conducts two newspapers,—one known as the Wisconsin Farmer, conducted and carried on at Madison, Wisconsin, and another known as the Live Stock Indicator, published at Kansas City, in the state of Missouri. The 118 shares of stock owned by the Pierce-Wallace Company in the Homestead Company are a majority of the stock in the latter company. The other stock is owned by S. F. Stewart, Frank Dunning, A. G. Lucas, and Pierce and Wallace in their individual capacity. In his original petition the appellee asked for a dissolution of the corporation and a distribution of its assets, but this he afterwards amended by striking out the prayer for dissolution, and the relief asked when the case was tried was the appointment of a receiver, and such equitable relief as the facts would warrant. His claim in this court is (using the language of his counsel): (1) That Pierce and Wallace were the sole and equal owners of the stock in the Pierce-Wallace Publishing Company. (2) That between these two men differences of a personal nature had arisen, and from an accumulation of causes had become so intensified that nothing in the way of conference or communication between them was possible. (3) That in consequence no meeting of the board of directors or stockholders could be had, and no authoritative direction could be given in the affairs of the corporation. (4) That Pierce had taken possession of and assumed control over the affairs and property of the corporation, and by one means and another was excluding Wallace therefrom. (5) That in many respects the management by Pierce was not only contrary to the views of Wallace, but, having taken sole possession, and maintaining it by such means as might be required, he was manipulating matters in his own interest, and utterly disregarding the rights and wishes of Wallace. And he contends that the order appointing the receiver should be sustained.

We are at a loss to know whether or not appellee is asking for the dissolution of the Pierce-Wallace corporation. He struck out this part of the prayer from his original petition, and does not expressly insist upon this relief, although his contention seems to be that at the final hearing he should have such a decree as would practically amount to a dissolution of the corporation. It may be that the reason why he does not ask that the corporation be dissolved is to be found in the fact that his counsel are of the opinion that such relief cannot be had under the facts as they are disclosed by this record. But, whether this be the fact or not, it is certainly true that, in the absence of express statutory authority, jurisdiction of courts of equity does not exist over the corporate bodies to such an extent as to justify them in dissolving corporations, or of winding up their affairs and sequestering their property. This seems to be so well settled that there is scarcely a dissenting voice in authority. See High, Receivers, 3d ed. §§ 233, 239; Beach, Receivers, § 403; 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 57; Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 282, 283; French v. Gifford, 30 Iowa, 153; Thomp. Corp. §§ 4538, 4539, 6703. Our statutes do not, in terms, authorize the appointment of a receiver for the purpose of winding up a going corporation. The only provision we have is general in character, and does not relate to any specific class of cases. It is as follows: "On the petition of either party to a civil action or proceeding wherein he shows he has a probable right to or interest in any property which is the subject of the controversy, and that such property or its rents or profits are in danger of being lost or materially injured or impaired . . . the court, . . . if satisfied that the interests of one or both parties will be thereby promoted and the substantial rights of neither unduly infringed, may appoint a receiver to take charge of and control such property under its direction during the pendency of the action, and may order and coerce the delivery of it to him." Code, § 2908. We have heretofore held that this section does not authorize the dissolution of a corporation by a court of equity, nor the placing of its property in the hands of a receiver, which practically accomplishes the same purpose. French v. Gifford, 30 Iowa, 153. We have also held, however, that one who brings himself within the provisions of § 2908 may have a receiver appointed as well of the effects of a corporation as of an individual or copartner.

ship. Dickerson v. Cass County Bank, 95 Iowa, 392. And we also said in French v. Gifford, that there are cases in which a receiver will be appointed for the property of a corporation, as, for instance, where the officers have been guilty of a misappropriation of the funds or a breach of trust in the discharge of official duties.

Turning now to the record to discover the facts upon which appellee relies for the appointment of a receiver, we find that his complaints are: (1) That Pierce had arrogated to himself the active management of the corporation, and excluded appellee therefrom, and withheld and refused to give appellee any satisfactory information as to the condition of the business, and had deprived him of the funds of the corporation and of the management of its financial affairs as treasurer of that concern. (2) That irreconcilable differences exist between appellee and Pierce, which render it impracticable and impossible for them to transact business with each other, or to consult together upon any business proposition. (3) That the corporation is indebted to each of the stockholders in the sum of $5,500, and by reason of the feeling existing between these parties no provision has or can be made for the liquidation of this indebtedness. (4) That no adequate provision can be made for the maintenance, operation, and continuance of the newspapers published by the corporation in Wisconsin and Missouri. (5) That the business of the corporation cannot be carried on as intended and provided for in its articles of incorporation, and that the objects of the corporation and intentment of its stockholders are completely frustrated. These are the substance of the allegations of the petition. The evidence adduced in support of them shows that the state of feeling between these men is very bitter, and that they scarcely ever meet without some fuel being added to the flame. But it seems that their trouble grew out of, and largely, if not wholly, relates to, the management and control of the Homestead Company. Various and sundry disagreements arose between Pierce and Wallace as to the conduct and policy of this paper; and Wallace, who was until recently its editor, was finally deposed by action of its board of control. This and numerous other suits followed and a train of unfortunate litigation is impending.

In considering the case we must carefully distinguish between the various corporations which are more or less involved in the proceedings. The suit is against Pierce and the Pierce-Wallace Publishing Company; not against the Homestead Company, nor its stockholders or officers. Of it, therefore, we have no jurisdiction. And we should approve of no order which will have the effect of controlling its management or directing its affairs, unless it of necessity results from giving effect to a proper order made in a proceeding against the Pierce-Wallace Company. The only difference between the parties relating to the Pierce-Wallace Company grew out of the publication in the Wisconsin paper of some essays delivered at a session of the Farmers' Institute in that state, in advance of their official publication under the auspices of the dean of the University of Wisconsin. This difference arose in May, 1894, more than one year prior to the bringing of this suit, and seems to have been satisfactorily adjusted; at least the parties continued in business for many months after this dispute, and it was so inconsequential in character that no court would be justified in appointing a receiver on account of it. Wallace says that Pierce deposited all the funds of both the Homestead Company and the Pierce-Wallace Company in his own name, and assumed all the duties of treasurer of both corporations, although he (Wallace) was the duly elected treasurer. The record discloses that Pierce did deposit the funds of both corporations in his own name, and for a time drew his checks against the deposits; that this was done at the suggestion of Wallace, or at least with his acquiescence, until more serious difficulties arose between the parties as to the conduct and management of the Homestead Company, at which time Wallace insisted upon recognition of his rights as treasurer. His demands were acceded to in so far as the depositing of the funds was concerned, with some little delay, which is at least partially explained; and at the time of the commencement of this suit the funds of the Pierce-Wallace Company were deposited in the name of that company. After Wallace's deposition as editor of the Homestead he brought a suit to compel Pierce to turn over to him as treasurer the funds of the Pierce-Wallace Company. After the suit was commenced, Pierce agreed to turn over these funds, and, for aught that appears in the record, this agreement has been complied with.

These are all the matters of difference between these parties as to the Pierce-Wallace Company, and it is manifest from the order made by the lower court that he did not regard them as sufficient to justify the appointment of a receiver of all property of this corporation, for he directed the receiver to take charge of nothing but the 118 shares of stock of the Homestead Company. And, if there were any doubts about the matter, they would be dispelled by appellee's own testimony, wherein he says: "We have never had any disagreement with reference to the matters of the Pierce-Wallace Publishing Company except the one I have referred to. We continued to run the affairs of this company from February, when this controversy arose, until February in the next year. During this year there was never a controversy with reference to any matter pertaining to the Pierce-Wallace Company's affairs, except at the very start in this Wisconsin business, for the reason that during that year, after this started, I knew little or nothing about the affairs of the company. I don't know whether we would have had a controversy if I had known anything about it. I stated that as the reason why we did not have a controversy. I do not know any more about them now than I did then." It is perfectly apparent that appellee has no right to a dissolution of the Pierce-Wallace Company, and that a receiver should not be appointed for all its property, nor any part of it, unless there be something in the controversy with reference to the Homestead Company matters which is a justification for the order authorizing the receiver to take charge of the stock of that company owned by the Pierce-Wallace corporation.

With reference to the Homestead Company, we find there are decided differences between the members of that company, which are apparently irreconcilable; but they relate to matters intra vires, and, except as hereafter noted, do not have reference to the Pierce-Wallace Company. These disputes quite largely, if not wholly, related to the editorial management of the newspaper published by the Homestead Company; Wallace insisting that he should control the utterances of that department, while Pierce and the other stockholders and directors were asserting the right of supervision, and, to a certain extent at least, control, of the editorial columns. The breach caused by this difference widened until it led to the deposition of plaintiff, by regular vote of the directors of the corporation, from the editorial management of the paper. Now, without going into the merits of this unfortunate controversy, and without indicating our views as to who is at fault, we simply say that, if it be conceded that the managers and directors of the Homestead Company were at fault, it would give the plaintiff no right to the appointment of the receiver. The Homestead Company is not a party to this suit. It is an independent corporation, composed of different stockholders from those who own the stock in the Pierce-Wallace Company, and is managed by other officers. Again, no actionable fraud is charged against the officers of the Homestead Company. Plaintiff was deposed by a regular majority vote, and as a minority stockholder or officer he has no cause for complaint. It is a general rule that a minority cannot dictate the policy of the corporation, and no interference with its management in their behalf can be justified unless it be absolutely necessary to the attainment of justice. Peatman v. Central Light, H. & P. Power Co. (Iowa) 69 N. W. 541. But we have already said too much as to the power to appoint a receiver for the Homestead Company, for such relief is not asked, and the receiver was not granted in a suit against it. The appointment was made with directions to the receiver to take charge of a part of the property of the Pierce-Wallace Company, to wit, the stock owned by it in the Homestead Company; and the part of this opinion referring to this last-named corporation is designed to make plain the difference which exists in these two bodies, and to show, if we can, that a dispute as to the management or policy of the Homestead Company will not of itself authorize the appointment of a receiver for the other corporation. We take it from the record that the lower court concluded that there were such differences between Pierce and Wallace as to the management of the Homestead Company that they could not act together in matters relating to the Pierce-Wallace Company, and could not properly represent the latter corporation in the meetings of the Homestead Company; and it seems that the receiver was appointed in order that it might be represented at the meetings of the stockholders of the Homestead corporation. It further appears that the court below did not think there were such differences as would hinder the Pierce-Wallace corporation in the exercise of its functions, except in relation to the Homestead stock, for he denied the receivership as to all the property save this stock; and we may say, in justification of the court's refusal, that we think it was right in so doing. Plaintiff has not been denied any right in this corporation. He is still at liberty to handle the funds, and to perform his duties as a stockholder, director, and officer. What have we, then, as to the management of the stock in the Homestead Company?

It appears that after Wallace's deposition as editor of the Homestead paper he demanded a meeting of the board of directors. Pierce called the meeting, but Wallace was out of town. It is said that Pierce did not know of his absence, but this is immaterial, for the reason that a second meeting was called shortly afterwards, when Wallace was in the city, and this he refused to attend. As soon as the meeting was called, Pierce drew up a resolution which gave to each of the parties a proxy to vote one half of the Homestead Company stock at the meeting of that corporation. This resolution was submitted to Wallace in advance of the meeting, as indicating Pierce's views; and it seems that Pierce was anxious that all matters with reference to the action of this corporation should be agreed upon, to avoid any possibility of difficulty. Now, it seems to be held by some of the English courts that a receiver will be appointed where there is such a dispute among the members of a governing body as prevents the affairs being carried on properly. See Penfatherstone v. Cooke, L. R. 16 Eq. 298; 2 Cook, Stock, Stockholders, & Corp. Law, § 684; Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 234, 285. Mr. Cook says, however [note 2, p. 981], the court will not interfere unless the corporation is in a condition in which there is no proper governing body, or there are such dissensions in the governing body as that it is impossible to carry on the business with advantage to the parties interested. "In such a case the court will interfere, but only for a limited time, and to as small an extent as possible." There are other authorities holding to a contrary doctrine. American Loan & T. Co. v. Toledo, C. & S. R. Co. 29 Fed. Rep. 416; Little Warrior Coal Co. v. Hooper, 105 Ala. 665; Einstein v. Rosenfeld, 88 N. J. Eq. 309. And it is manifest that courts are loath to appoint a receiver for the mere purpose of carrying on the business of a corporation which is being conducted by its proper officers, although not to the profit or satisfaction of its stockholders, for the reason, as said by Judge Thompson in his work on Corporations, at § 6834, "that the sovereign does not furnish public agencies for the carrying on of private enterprises." But, whatever may be the true rule with reference to this matter, it appears that the Pierce-Wallace Company is being managed by the officers selected for that purpose, just as it was before plaintiff was deposed, except that he has voluntarily refused to attend its meetings, or to participate in the management of its business. There has been no such disagreement between the officers of this corporation with reference to its affairs as to render it impossible for it to carry on the business for which it was organized. The record shows but one meeting of the directors after plaintiff's deposition as editor of the Homestead, and this he refused to attend, not, as we understand it, because of any disagreement between the directors or stockholders as to the management of this corporation, but because of the effect it might have upon the affairs of the Homestead Company. Evidence is abundant to the effect that all essential differences grew out of difficulties which arose with reference to the management of the Homestead, and that these litigants are not at variance with reference to the management of the Pierce-Wallace Company. Plaintiff, as we believe, failed to attend the meetings of this latter corporation simply because he did not wish to have the stock held by it in the Homestead Company represented at the meetings of this last named concern, and would not agree to the appointment of proxies, as suggested by Pierce, solely because of the effect it might have upon the Homestead difficulty.

Whether there will, in the future, be such dissensions and differences between these parties as will authorize the appointment of a receiver,—conceding that one may be appointed for these causes,—is almost wholly a matter of conjecture. It does not follow that because of trouble in the management of the Homestead the business of the defendant corporation cannot be carried on. If differences should arise in the future, it will then be time to consider the rights of the parties. We have already mentioned the fact that claim is made that the corporation is indebted to plaintiff and defendant Pierce. The evidence established this claim. But it does not appear that this indebtedness has been reduced to judgment, or that any lien exists against the property of the corporation. And it is clearly shown that the corporation is perfectly solvent and able to meet its obligations. Plaintiff has no right as a creditor to the appointment of a receiver. This is a familiar doctrine, and requires no citation of authorities to support it.

Reference has been made to the case of Dickerson v. Cass County Bank. In that case it was found that there was such an action pending as justified the appointment of a receiver. It appeared, however, that the corporation was insolvent; that the officers were continuing the business at a loss, and were allowing the assets to be scattered, so that they could not be realized upon without great sacrifice; and that plaintiff, as a stockholder, was subject to a double liability under our statute. No one of these facts is present in this case. The only claim which has any merit is that there are dissensions among the stockholders and directors which render it impossible for the corporation to carry on its business.

The relief asked is, in effect, the dissolution of the corporation, or, if this be not the prayer, it is that the management of the corporation be taken out of the hands of the officers who have been conducting its business, and placed in the hands of an officer of the court for some indefinite period. It has already been seen that this is rarely, if ever, done; and, if such practice should be approved in this court, it is well to inquire. How long should the receivership be continued? There are but two stockholders in this corporation, plaintiff, Wallace and defendant Pierce. Now, a court of equity has no power to make them agree; and, if their differences are such as that it is impossible for them to carry on their business, it is not likely that the appointment of a receiver will bring about a reconciliation. It is practically conceded that a court of equity has no power, in the absence of a statute, to dissolve a going corporation. What, then, must result? Either that a court must carry on this business for the interest of the stockholders until the corporation is dissolved by lapse of time, or that one of the parties should sell his stock, or such portion thereof as will give a majority to one or the other of these litigants. We have already seen from the cases cited that it is with great reluctance that any court authorizes the appointment of a receiver because of dissensions in the governing bodies, and when it does "it will only interfere for a limited length of time, and to as small an extent as possible." It is not necessary to decide whether the rule announced in Featherstone v. Cooke is applicable in a state where the statute enumerates the causes for which a receiver may be appointed, for, if we accept it as correct doctrine, we do not think it applies to the facts of this case. It may be unfortunate that there is no remedy other than a sale of his stock by one or the other of the stockholders, but, if this be the case, it is a situation in which the parties voluntarily placed themselves; and, so long as no actual legal wrong is committed by either, they must be content with their condition. Our conclusions find support in the following, among other authorities: Hinkley v. Blethen, 78 Me. 221; Pond v. Vermont Valley R. Co. 12 Blatchf. 280; State, Merriam, v. Ross, 129 Mo. 435, 22 L. R. A. 634; Loomis v. McKenzie, 31 Iowa, 425; People v. Weigley, 155 Ill. 491; Strong v. McCagg, 55 Wis. 624; Hinckley v. Pfister, 88 Wis. 64; French Bank Case, 53 Cal. 495; Republican Mountain Silver Mines v. Brown, 19 U. S. App. 203, 7 C. C. A. 412, 58 Fed. Rep. 644, 24 L. R. A. 776; Spelling, Priv. Corp. § 851; Jones v. Bank of Leadville, 10 Colo. 464.

The District Court was in error in appointing the receiver, and its order is reversed.

(April 10, 1897.)

CROSS APPEALS by plaintiff and intervener from a judgment of the District Court for Black Hawk County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover money in the hands of the Equitable Mutual Life & Endowment Association in satisfaction of a debt due by Clarence C. Knapp, which money was claimed by W. H. Knapp; the plaintiff appealing from certain rulings not going to the merits, and the intervener appealing from the judgment which awarded the amount to the plaintiff. Affirmed.

Statement by Kinne, Ch. J.:

Plaintiff on February 17, 1895, commenced his action against the defendants, aided by attachment, in which he sought to recover some $24,000. The attachment was levied by garnishing the Equitable Mutual Life & Endowment Association of Waterloo, Iowa, as a supposed debtor of the defendant Clarence C. Knapp. Defendants filed an answer in denial. Thereafter W. H. Knapp intervened in said action, claiming to be the owner of the funds in the hands of the garnishee. Plaintiff, in an answer to the intervener's petition, controverted his claim. The cause was tried to the court, and a judgment and decree entered for plaintiff for the amount claimed, and adjudging plaintiff to be entitled to the fund in controversy. Intervener appeals. The plaintiff also appeals from rulings which do not go to the merits of the controversy. As we conclude that upon the merits the case should be affirmed, we do not deem it necessary to further refer to plaintiff's appeal.

The facts appearing from the pleadings and evidence are that on the 23d day of July, 1885, one J. T. Knapp became a member of the Equitable Mutual Life & Endowment Association, a corporation conducting a mutual life insurance business. He received a certificate of membership, in which the defendant Clarence C. Knapp was named as beneficiary. Said certificate contained the following provisions:

"Death Claims. Upon receipt at the home office of satisfactory proofs, on proper blanks furnished by the association, of the death of said member, prior to ten full years from the date hereof, viz., the 23d day of July, 1895, at 12 M. of said day, the Equitable Mutual Life & Endowment Association will pay to Clarence C. Knapp, or, in case of ——— death before that of said assured, then to executors, administrators, or assigns of said member, . . . the net proceeds of one assessment upon all members at date of said death, not exceeding two thousand five hundred dollars.

"Endowment Claim. Upon the surrender of this certificate by the aforesaid member or legal holder, after having been kept in force for a period of ten full years, the Equitable Mutual Life & Endowment Association will pay to said member or legal holder his full share of the endowment fund of said association, not exceeding one thousand dollars."

Said certificate also provided that, "in case of assignment of the within certificate, the beneficiary must consent thereto, and said assignment must be approved by the secretary of the association; otherwise the assignment shall be void."

The assured and the beneficiary were, when said certificate issued, partners engaged in the business of banking at Cedar Falls, Iowa, under the firm name of J. T. Knapp & Co. In September or October, 1893, the assured wrote the beneficiary that he would make no more payments on said certificate, and that, if he (the beneficiary) wanted to keep it up, he would have to look after it. Afterwards, and on October 30, 1893, said beneficiary assigned said certificate to the intervener, Will H. Knapp, but said assignment was not then approved by the secretary of the association. There was no consideration for this assignment, other than Will H. Knapp's agreement to pay all assessments and dues then due, or which might thereafter accrue against J. T. Knapp, as the party insured in said certificate. Will H. Knapp was a son of Clarence C. Knapp, and a nephew of the assured. Will H. Knapp thereafter, and until the death of the assured, paid such assessments as were due upon the membership of the assured. November 14, 1893, J. T. Knapp died. December 12, 1893, Clarence C. Knapp executed another assignment of said certificate to Will H. Knapp, which purported to be made to complete the assignment theretofore executed. This last paper was approved by the secretary of the association. Thereafter the intervener had prepared and sent to the association proofs of the death of J. T. Knapp, and the association collected an assessment from its members to pay the amount due upon said certificate, being over $2,300, which, by agreement of the parties, was paid into the hands of the clerk of the district court to abide the order of said court.

Mr. E. E. Hauser, for plaintiff:

An endowment certificate or endowment policy differs materially from the ordinary life insurance policy.

Cooke, Life Ins. § 107, p. 198.

It is not the certificate of Clarence C. Knapp. It is J. T. Knapp's certificate as long as he lives; and it is his to do with as he pleases as long as he lives; during his life it is under his control.

Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 391-600, 29 L. ed. 997-999; 2 May, Insurance, 3d. ed. § 890, p. 859; Tennis v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 26 Minn. 271; Lamberton v. Bogart, 46 Minn. 409; Evers v. Life Asso. of America, 59 Mo. 429.

The endowment policy or certificate in suit is not good as an executed gift to Clarence C. Knapp. It is so conditioned that it is revocable by J. T. Knapp at any time during his life.

Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 602, 27 L. ed. 500.

The policy in suit is during the life of J. T. Knapp completely within his control and assignable by him, so as to pass the whole insurance to his assignee.

No right or title vests under a contract containing a condition precedent, until that condition happens. A fortiori it is true of a mere gift.

C. C. Knapp takes under this as a gift, if at all, and not by descent, devise, or purchase; and his rights are to be determined by the laws governing gifts. A gift must be completely executed, and it must go into immediate and absolute effect.

Irish v. Nutting, 47 Barb. 370; Smith v. Ferguson, 90 Ind. 229, 46 Am. Rep. 216; Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 602, 27 L. ed. 500, 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, title, Gifts, p. 1313.

If the gift is left incomplete, there exists a locus penitentia, and what has been done may be revoked.

Tulcott v. Field, 34 Neb. 611; May, Ins. § 458.

If the beneficiary assign, the assignee must have an insurable interest in the life of the assured, or the assignment will be held void. The assignment of a policy to a party not having an insurable interest is just as objectionable as the taking out of a policy in his name. To the extent to which the assignee stipulates for the proceeds of the policy beyond the sums advanced by him, he stands in the position of one holding a wager policy.

Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 779, 26 L. ed. 926; Franklin L. Ins. Co. v. Hazard, 41 Ind. 116, 13 Am. Rep. 813; Sterens v. Warren, 101 Mass. 564; Cammark v. Lewis, 82 U. Katterman*, 112 Pa. 251; Price v. Supreme Lodge K. of H. 68 Tex. 361; Missouri Valley L. Ins. Co. v. McCrum, 86 Kan. 146, 59 Am. Rep. 537.

There must be a reasonable ground founded upon the relations of the parties to each other, either pecuniary or of blood or affinity, to expect some benefit or advantage from the continuance of the life of the assured. Otherwise the contract is a mere wager, by which the party taking the policy is directly interested in the early death of the insured.

Where one procures insurance on the life of another in whom he has no insurable interest, the policy is void.

Messrs. Boles & Boles, for intervenor:

If C. C. Knapp had a vested property interest in this certificate of membership issued on the life of J. T. Knapp, prior to the enactment of § 1767, McClain's Digest, which he might then have assigned, the statute cannot be permitted to deprive him of such vested right or of the power to assign it.

The beneficiary in an ordinary life policy acquires the entire property interest in the contract the moment the policy is executed and delivered.

Bacon, Ben. Soc. & Life Ins. § 292; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 655; Harley v. Heist, 86 Ind. 190, 44 Am. Rep. 285; Central Nat. Bank v. Hume, 128 U. S. 195, 32 L. ed. 870; Bliss, Life Ins. 2d ed. § 818; May, Insurance, 3d. ed. § 899 L.

The vested interest of a beneficiary in an ordinary life policy may be assigned by such beneficiary during the lifetime of the party whose life is insured.

18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 646 et seq.; Bacon, Ben. Soc. & Life Ins. § 297. Fowler v. Butterly, 78 N. Y. 68, 84 Am. Rep. 507.

There is practically no distinction, save one, in the rights of a person whose life is insured upon the ordinary life plan and the rights of a person whose life is insured by a mutual benefit society. In neither case has the person whose life is insured any property interest in the insurance unless he or his estate is named as the beneficiary. The only difference between the rights of persons whose lives are insured upon one plan or the other is this: that the member of a mutual benefit society ordinarily has the right to change the beneficiary named in his certificate at any time that he may so elect, without the consent of such beneficiary, whereas the person whose life is insured by the ordinary life policy has no such power.

Brown v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 80 Iowa, 287; Hellenberg v. District No. 1 I. O. of B. B. 94 N. Y. 580.

As to the rights of beneficiaries named in the two kinds of contracts, the courts unite in holding that the ground of distinction between the rights of a beneficiary under an ordinary life policy and the rights of a beneficiary under the ordinary certificate of membership of a mutual benefit society is this: that in the former case the interest of the beneficiary cannot be defeated without his consent, and in the latter the interest of such beneficiary is subject to be defeated at the will of the person whose life is insured and without the consent of such beneficiary. For this reason it is said that the interest of a beneficiary under an ordinary life policy is vested and assignable from the moment of the policy's issue.

Brown v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 80 Iowa, 290; Smith v. National Ben. Soc. 128 N. Y. 85, 9 L. R. A. 616; May, Ins. 3d ed. § 899 L., 399 M.; Harley v. Heist, 86 Ind. 196, 44 Am. Rep. 285.

The interest of a beneficiary in a life policy upon either plan is vested and assignable from the moment of the policy's issue, or is not so vested, depending upon the question whether the interest of the beneficiary may be defeated without his consent, by the act of the insured member.

Whether the interest of a beneficiary may be defeated without his consent depends upon the terms of the contract under which such beneficiary derives his interest.

Harley v. Heist, 86 Ind. 196, 44 Am. Rep. 285; Niblack, Mut. Ben. Soc. & Acci. Ins. 2d ed. p. 406; Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc. v. Burkhardt, 110 Ind. 189; Presbyterian Mut. Assur. Fund v. Allen, 106 Ind. 598.

If the terms of this contract expressly prohibit a change of beneficiary without his consent, the question involved in this case is entirely freed from difficulty, and it is undeniable that under such circumstances the interest of the beneficiary was a vested and assignable interest.

There is no provision in the certificate of membership or the articles of incorporation or by-laws of the association permitting the member to change the beneficiary named in the certificate without the consent of such beneficiary.

The words "assignment of the within certificate" mean a change or transfer of the beneficial interest in the certificate.

Hirschl v. Clark, 81 Iowa, 200, 9 L. R. A. 841.

By the express provisions of this contract, all assignments are prohibited unless the beneficiary shall consent thereto.

The parties intended that the consent of C. C. Knapp must be obtained to a change of that part of the contract which involved his own interests.

It is unnecessary at common law that the assignee of a life insurance policy should have an insurable interest in the life of the insured.

Cooke, Life Ins. p. 121; St. John v. American Mut. L. Ins. Co. 18 N. Y. 89, 64 Am. Dec. 529; Falton v. National Fund L. Assur. Co. 20 N. Y. 32; Olmsted v. Keyes, 85 N. Y. 593; Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Allen, 188 Mass. 24, 53 Am. Rep. 245; Eckel v. Renner, 41 Ohio St. 282; Martin v. Stubbings, 126 Ill. 387; Fitzpatrick v. Hartford L. & A. Ins. Co. 56 Conn. 116; Clark v. Allen, 11 R. I. 439, 23 Am. Rep. 496; Murphy v. Red, 64 Miss. 614, 60 Am. Rep. 68; Rüttler v. Smith, 70 Md. 261, 2 L. R. A. 844; Souder v. Home Friendly Soc. 72 Md. 511; Bursinger v. Bank of Watertown, 67 Wis. 75, 58 Am. Rep. 848, and other cases. See also Johnson v. Van Epps, 110 Ill. 551; Lamont v. Grand Lodge I. L. of H. 81 Fed. Rep. 177.

Where assignments of life policies are held void upon the ground of a want of insurable interest in the assignee at the time of the assignment, such holding is based absolutely and solely upon considerations of public policy.

which obtain in the jurisdictions holding such doctrines.

At the moment of this assignment, the statute of this state authorized mutual benefit societies to issue certificates of membership naming any relative of the member as the beneficiary thereof.

Simcoke v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 84 Iowa, 383, 15 L. R. A. 114.

If the secretary of the association did not in fact approve such assignment it was not thereby rendered void, for the reason that the provision of the contract requiring the approval of the assignment by the secretary of the association was a provision intended for the benefit of such association and which the association might waive, and no one, other than the association, can complain of such nonapproval by its secretary.

Niblack, Ben. Soc. & Acci. Ins. 2d ed. p. 830; May, Ins. 8d ed. § 459 F; Simcoke v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. 84 Iowa, 383, 15 L. R. A. 114; Tinsworth v. Tinsworth, 40 Kan. 571; Spawen v. Chew, 60 Tex. 533; Manning v. Ancient Order of United Workmen, 86 Ky. 186.

This is a contract purporting to be made between two parties for the benefit of a third.

In Gilbert v. Sanderson, 56 Iowa, 849, 41 Am. Rep. 108, this court held that where a contract was made between two persons for the benefit of a third the original parties to the contract might rescind the same "unless in the meantime the person for whose benefit it was made in some manner has indicated he accepts the contract, or it can be implied he does so. By so doing he acquires the rights and assumes the burdens incident thereto."

While certain courts have held that the right of the member to change the beneficiary in a mutual benefit certificate without the consent of the beneficiary exists, unless by the provisions of the contract such change is prohibited, yet such holding is directly in conflict with the principles of law which have long been applied to ordinary life policies.

Niblack, Ben. Soc. & Acci. Ins. 2d ed. § 212; Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 304; Harley v. Heist, 86 Ind. 196, 44 Am. Rep. 285; May, Ins. 8d ed. § 899M.

In the various decisions of this court the right of the member of a mutual benefit association to change the beneficiary named in his certificate has always been predicated upon the express reservations of the contract giving to the member such right, or upon the statute now in force in this state, which authorizes the change of beneficiaries.

Brown v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 30 Iowa, 290; McClure v. Johnson, 56 Iowa, 620; Niblack, Ben. Soc. & Acci. Ins. 2d ed. p. 407; Schmidt v. Iowa K. of P. Ins. Assn. 82 Iowa, 304; Brown v. Grand Council N. W. L. of H. 81 Iowa, 400; Hirsch v. Clark, 81 Iowa, 200, 9 L. R. A. 841.

The possession of a certificate by C. C. Knapp was not necessary in order to give him a right of action thereon, nor was such possession necessary in order to enable him to assign such right of action if he had it, or any interest which he acquired by virtue of the terms of the contract.

Kinne, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Counsel have exhaustively and ably argued many interesting questions arising upon this record. In our view, however, the controlling question in the case is as to the right of Clarence C. Knapp to assign the certificate to the intervener. If he had no such right, then it is clear that intervener is not entitled to the fund in controversy. We proceed, therefore, to a consideration of that question. At the outset it should be said that the object of the association, as stated in its articles of incorporation, is "benevolent and mutual assistance among its members and their families, or designated beneficiaries, by the collection of dues and assessments, and disbursement at the death of its members, or at stated periods, less cost of maintaining association." (The italics above are ours.) The certificate of membership provides that upon proper proof of the death of a member being made, and in case he dies within ten years from the date of the issuing of the certificate, the association will pay to "Clarence C. Knapp, or, in case of ——— death before that of said assured, then to executors, administrators, or assigns of said member, . . ." It also provides that upon the surrender of the certificate by the "aforesaid member or legal holder, after having been kept in force for a period of ten full years, the . . . association will pay to said member or legal holder his full share of the endowment fund of said association, not exceeding $1,000." It also provides that "in case of assignment of the within certificate the beneficiary must consent thereto, and said assignment must be approved by the secretary of the association; otherwise the assignment shall be void." There is no express provision in the certificate, articles of incorporation, or by-laws authorizing a change in the beneficiary, unless some of the provisions heretofore set out can be construed to give such authority. It is the general rule that a beneficiary under an ordinary life policy takes a vested interest therein at the moment the policy is executed and delivered, which cannot be impaired or defeated by any act of the assured, or of the assured and the company, to which said beneficiary does not assent. 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 655; Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 292; Bliss, Ins. § 818; May, Ins. § 899; L. Biddle, Ins. § 285; Harley v. Heist, 86 Ind. 196, 44 Am. Rep. 285; Damron v. Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. 99 Ind. 478; Presbyterian Mut. Assur. Fund v. Allen, 106 Ind. 598; Thomas v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 12 Wash. 500. It follows that such policies may be assigned, unless such act be contrary to the statute, the articles of incorporation, or by-laws of the company, or to the provisions of the policy itself. 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 646; Biddle, Ins. § 288; Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 297; Plummer v. People's Nat. Bank, 65 Iowa, 405; McClure v. Johnson, 56 Iowa, 620.

Appellant contends that the assured, in the case at bar, is given no authority, by the certificate, by-laws, or articles of incorporation, to change the beneficiary; hence, the beneficiary named in the certificate had a vested interest in it the moment it was issued. In other words, he says that no right has been reserved to the assured, in the contract or laws of the association, to change the beneficiary; therefore none exists; and the rights of Clarence C. Knapp would be the same, as to the assignment of the policy, as in case of an ordinary life policy. Appellant's conclusions do not necessarily follow, even if the fact be as he claims. It is true that the rights of the assured are to be determined from the contract, and the contract embraces the certificate, by-laws, articles of incorporation, statute law, if any, and such rights as necessarily inhere in membership in such an association. Now, if the contract be silent as to the rights of the assured to change his beneficiary, what right has he in that respect? It is also true that, in most of the cases in which it has been held that the assured had a right to change the beneficiary, it will be found that the contract expressly reserved such right to the assured; and that is true as to every such case decided by this court. The question, therefore, as now presented, is an open one in this state. In Niblack, Ben. Soc. § 212, it is said that it has been held with substantial unanimity, wherever the question has arisen, that in mutual benefit societies the member may change his beneficiary without other limitations or restrictions than such as are imposed by law, the articles of incorporation, the by-laws, or the certificate. In other words, the general doctrine is said to be that the assured has a right to change the beneficiary unless the contract or statute provides to the contrary. In Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc. v. Burkhardt, 110 Ind. 192, it is said: "The general rule applicable to beneficiary or charitable associations is, that the beneficiary acquires no vested right to the benefits which are to accrue upon the death of a member, until the death of the member occurs. During his lifetime the member may therefore exercise the power of appointment without other limits or restrictions except such as are imposed by the organic law, or by rules and regulations of the society, duly adopted in compliance therewith." In Presbyterian Mut. Assur. Fund v. Allen, 106 Ind. 598, the court said: "The weight of authority . . . is in favor of the general doctrine that beneficiaries may be changed in cases where policies like the one before us are issued by such associations as the present, and that in this respect such policies are not governed by the general rule which governs ordinary insurance contracts." Many cases are referred to in support of the above holdings. Thomas v. Grand Lodge A. O. of U. W. 12 Wash. 500, was a case of a mutual benefit certificate, and it was held that the insured had the right at any time during his lifetime to change the beneficiary. On the trial a question arose as to whether a certain by-law, which gave the members the right to change the beneficiary named in the certificate, was in evidence, so that it might be considered. The court held, in effect, that it was immaterial whether it was in evidence or not, and said: "It will be presumed that he had full right to control the benefit until the contrary is made to appear. The authorities upon this proposition are not entirely uniform, but, as above suggested, a great majority of the cases have so held." Referring to the statement, sometimes found in the cases, that it is difficult to assign any reason for the distinction between such certificates and the ordinary life policies, as to the right of the assured to change the beneficiary, the same court says: "This may be true, but one good reason suggests itself, and that is, that these certificates are not in themselves an absolute contract which could, under the constitution and by-laws of the order, be entered into with any person. Under such constitution and by-laws these beneficiary certificates can only be issued to members. Hence, it seems reasonable that anything which would affect the right to membership would affect the right to the beneficiary certificate, and that since the membership can at any time be changed by the member without the consent of the beneficiary, he can also change the certificate. Upon reason and authority the beneficiary certificate should be presumed to be within the control of the member." See also Lloeff v. Supreme Lodge K. of H. 118 Cal. 91, 83 L. R. A. 174. Such associations are distinguishable from ordinary life insurance companies in many respects. By membership in such associations the assured obtains certain rights which inhere in the organization. So the class or classes of beneficiaries in them is limited, and such provisions, while in entire harmony with the object and purpose of such associations, are incompatible with the theory of regular life insurance, wherein the beneficiary, on the issuance of the policy, obtains a vested right therein. We conclude, therefore, in the absence of any provisions in the certificate, by-laws, articles of incorporation, or statute, either providing expressly for a change of beneficiaries or prohibiting such change, that by reason of the character and purposes of such associations it should be held that the power to change the beneficiary is vested in the member assured during his lifetime. Fischer v. American L. of H. 163 Pa. 279; Voigt v. Korsten, 164 Ill. 814.

2. From what has already been said, the conclusion follows that Clarence C. Knapp could have had no assignable interest in the certificate issued upon the life of J. T. Knapp, because he had no vested interest therein, as the power to change the beneficiary vested in the assured during his lifetime. That conclusion is sustained when we come to consider more carefully the character of the contract before us. It is what is called an "endowment certificate." By its terms the assured, in case he is alive at the expiration of the endowment period, becomes entitled to his full share of the endowment fund of the association, upon surrendering the certificate. If the assured dies prior to the expiration of the endowment period, and Clarence C. Knapp survives him, upon furnishing proofs of death of said assured, said Clarence C. Knapp is entitled to the benefits of the policy. If the assured dies during the endowment period, and Clarence C. Knapp is not then alive, then the sum due is to be paid to the executors, administrators, or assigns of the assured. Such a certificate, it seems to us, must of necessity be under the control of the assured until his death. How can it be claimed that Clarence C. Knapp had a vested interest in the certificate prior to the death of the assured, and within the limit of the endowment period? At the expiration of the endowment period, the ten years, if J. T. Knapp was living he had the absolute right to deliver up the certificate and receive the endowment provided for therein. Such an act on his part would have satisfied the obligation of the association. So long as the assured was alive, and the endowment period had not expired, it could not be said that the assured might not outlive such period, and thus become the sole beneficiary under the certificate. Therefore it seems to us that during the entire endowment period, while the assured lived, he must be held to have the absolute right of control of the certificate, as against Clarence C. Knapp, and the latter could, within said time have no vested right therein; hence his assignee, the intervener, took nothing by the assignment from Clarence C. Knapp. Under such a policy it is said the rights of the beneficiary named, who is to be paid the proceeds of the certificate in case of the death of the assured before the expiration of the endowment period, do not attach until the decease of the assured within such period. 2 May, Ins. § 390, P, and cases cited. And see also, as bearing somewhat upon this question, Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 29 L. ed. 997; Tennas v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 26 Minn. 271; Evers v. Life Assn. of America, 59 Mo. 429.

3. If the contract authorized the assured to change the beneficiary, then there can be no doubt that Clarence C. Knapp could acquire no vested interest therein during the lifetime of the assured, and hence could not make an assignment which would carry any interest therein to the intervener, unless by virtue of other provisions which may be claimed to modify the contract in that respect. The authorities are uniform in holding that when the right to change a beneficiary is reserved in the contract, and in the absence of other controlling provisions, the beneficiary named in the certificate acquires no vested interest until the death of the assured, and prior to that time the assured may change the beneficiary at will. Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 289; Niblack, Ben. Soc. § 312; Brown v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. 80 Iowa, 287; Hirsch v. Clark, 81 Iowa, 200, 9 L. R. A. 841; Schmidt v. Iowa K. of P. Ins. Assn. 82 Iowa, 804, 11 L. R. A. 205; Richmond v. Johnson, 28 Minn. 447; Byrne v. Casey, 70 Tex. 247; Sabin v. Phinney, 134 N. Y. 423; Supreme Council of Catholic Mut. Ben. Assn. v. Priest, 46 Mich. 429; Hellenberg v. District No. 1 I. O. of B. E. 94 N. Y. 580; Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc. v. Burkhardt, 110 Ind. 189; Hotel-Men's Mut. Ben. Assn. v. Brown, 33 Fed. Rep. 11; May, Ins. § 399L; Smith v. National Ben. Soc. 123 N. Y. 85, 9 L. R. A. 616; Presbyterian Mut. Assur. Fund v. Allen, 106 Ind. 593.

4. Is there anything in this contract which modifies the general rule above stated? Appellant contends that the provision on the back of the policy, that "in case of assignment of the within certificate the beneficiary must consent thereto, and said assignment must be approved by the secretary of the association; otherwise the assignment shall be void,"— limited the right of the assured to change the beneficiary, and hence Clarence C. Knapp took a vested interest in said certificate. It is conceded that the assignment above mentioned refers to an assignment made by the assured, not to one made by the beneficiary; and that is, no doubt, a correct construction of the contract. Attention is called to the case of Hirsch v. Clark, 81 Iowa, 200, 9 L. R. A. 841, wherein it was said that a change of beneficiary was the same thing, in effect, as an assignment. Hence it is claimed that the word "assignment," used above, embraced also a change in beneficiaries made by the assured, and therefore he could not thus change without the consent of the beneficiary. We do not so regard it. Bearing in mind the fact that under the other provisions of the contract, and in view of the nature of the association, the assured had a right to change the beneficiary, we should not be justified in so construing the language under consideration as to deprive him of such right, unless such was plainly the intent, and unless there is no other way in which force and effect can be given to all of the provisions of the contract. If the word "assignment" be given its ordinary meaning (that is, of a formal transfer of the certificate from the assured to another person), the language used is given force and effect without limiting the right of the assured to change the beneficiary. We think it is clear from the words used that it was not intended to limit the power possessed by the assured to change the beneficiary at will during his lifetime. The language is, "in case of assignment of the within certificate," etc. These were apt words to protect the company from having the certificate assigned to a third person without their knowledge. They intended that no assignment should be made of the "within certificate" unless the beneficiary named therein consented, and not then until it was approved by the secretary of the association. The provision was chiefly intended for the protection of the association. It would not be necessary in case the assured should change the beneficiary named in the certificate, because such formal change could only be made by notifying the association in some manner, and ordinarily it would be evidenced by a new certificate. There was therefore no limitation upon the right of the assured to change his beneficiary. Hence we need not determine what the effect might be of an assignment made without the consent of the beneficiary, and not approved by the association.

5. By § 7 of chap. 65, Acts 21st Gen. Assm., which relates to mutual benefit associations, it is provided: "No corporation or association organized or operating under this act shall issue any certificate of membership or policy to any person . . . unless the beneficiary under said certificate shall be the husband, wife, relative, legal representative, heir, or legatee of such insured member, nor shall any such certificate be assigned, except an endowment certificate, and any certificate issued or assigned made in violation of this section shall be void. Any member of any corporation, association, or society operating under this act shall have the right at any time, with the consent of such corporation, association, or society to make a change in his beneficiary without requiring the consent of such beneficiary." Counsel discuss the question of the applicability of this act to the case before us. The certificate in this case was issued prior to the passage of the act in question. If, as we hold, Clarence C. Knapp had, irrespective of this statute, no vested right in the certificate of insurance issued upon the life of his brother during said brother's lifetime, then the attempted assignment of said certificate during the brother's lifetime cast no rights upon the intervener. We need not, therefore, give this statute further consideration. We do not understand from the argument of counsel that any claim is based upon the assignment made after the death of the assured. We hold that there was no inhibition in the certificate, articles of incorporation, by-laws, or statutes which apply to this case, against the assured changing the beneficiary during his lifetime; that, in the absence thereof, he had a right to change the beneficiary; that, in view of the purposes of the order, it was intended to confer such right upon the assured; that, under an endowment certificate like that at bar, the rights of the beneficiary named in the certificate do not attach until the decease of the assured, if he die within the endowment period. It follows that Clarence C. Knapp never had a vested interest in the certificate of his brother which he could assign during the brother's lifetime, and therefore the intervener took nothing by the assignment relied upon. The title to the fund in court was therefore in Clarence C. Knapp, and subject to plaintiff's attachment.

We are agreed that the appeal of intervener is properly before us for consideration, and as upon the merits the case is determined in plaintiff's favor, we do not discuss the questions raised by his appeal. As the matters already considered are conclusive as to the rights of the parties, we are not justified in extending this opinion by the discussion of many other questions argued by counsel.

On both appeals the judgment and decrees below are affirmed.

NEW ORLEANS & NORTHEASTERN RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

McEWEN & MURRAY, Limited, et al.

(49 La. Ann. 1184.)

- *1. When loss to the plaintiff has been occasioned by accident and uncontrollable events (Rev. Civ. Code, art. 2754), the defendants, being without fault, are absolved from liability.
- *2. "In order to render a person chargeable in damages for an act of commission or omission on his part, it must have been the proximate cause of the damage."
- *3. A mere failure to guard against a certain result is not actionable negligence, unless, under all the circumstances, it might have been reasonably foreseen by a man of ordinary intelligence and prudence.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans, Division C, in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to property of plaintiff by reason of the alleged negligence of defendant. Affirmed.

Statement by Nicholls, Ch. J.:

Plaintiffs claim that McEwen & Murray, Limited, and the Gulf Lumber Company, Limited, are indebted to them in the sum of $4,781; that prior to September, 1893, they had properly erected along the south shore of Lake

Pontchartrain, between the intersection of People's avenue and the said lake and the Pointe aux Herbes, an embankment of earth, and had duly constructed thereon their railroad under and by virtue of legislative and municipal grants and franchises; that, in order to protect said embankment against the waters of Lake Pontchartrain in times of storm, they had constructed, at great expense, in front of said embankment, and between it and the said lake, a revetment amply sufficient for the purpose for which it was intended; that several months prior to the 1st of October, 1893, the Gulf Lumber Company, Limited, while towing in Lake Pontchartrain a raft of large saw logs, the property of McEwen & Murray, Limited, and destined for their mill, carelessly and negligently permitted the same to escape from their control, and to drift out upon the waters of Lake Pontchartrain; that said Gulf Lumber Company, Limited, was towing said logs under a contract, for full consideration, with McEwen & Murray, Limited, their obligation under that contract being to tow and deliver said logs in a careful and proper manner; that for several months thereafter said Gulf Lumber Company permitted, negligently and wantonly, and without proper cause or excuse therefor, said logs to float about loose and uncontrolled in said lake, when they could have easily and readily secured the same; that in the last days of September, or in the early part of October, 1893, there occurred a violent storm, which dashed the waters of Lake Pontchartrain with great force and fury against petitioners' revetment; that said revetment, however, was so well and strongly constructed that it withstood the force of said water, and protected petitioners' said roadway and embankment, and would have continued during and after the storm until the present day to so withstand said water and protect said roadbed and embankment, had it not been that the aforesaid logs, which even then were negligently and without proper cause permitted to drift about in said lake, were violently dashed, by the waters and waves raised by said storm, against said revetment, which was demolished in several places by the pounding of said logs, which broke through said revetment, and permitted the entrance of the waves, which washed away a great part of petitioners' revetment; that petitioners, after they had duly notified defendants that they would repair said revetment at their cost and expense, thus putting them in default, proceeded to repair, and did repair, the damage aforesaid, so caused entirely by the negligence and wrongful acts aforesaid of defendants, at a cost of $4,734, which they had paid, as would appear by an itemized bill annexed to the petition. They prayed for judgment against both defendants in solido for that amount. McEwen & Murray, Limited, defendants, answered, pleading, first, the general issue. Further answering, they admitted that the Gulf Lumber Company had been, and was still, under a contract to tow logs for the said mill owned and operated by McEwen & Murray, Limited, as shown in the answer filed in the case by said lumber company, and that the McEwen & Murray corporation were the owners of the saw logs which were scattered from the tow then under the control of the aforesaid lumber company on or about the 10th of April, 1893, as alleged by plaintiffs, and admitted by said lumber company in their answer; but they averred that the corporation of McEwen & Murray had neither possession nor control of said logs, as the same were then in transitu towards that company's sawmill, and in the possession and under the control of a common carrier, the aforesaid lumber company. They denied that the McEwen & Murray company were guilty of negligence or carelessness, either in the handling of said logs, or failing to recover the same, and emphatically denied that the company could be held liable for any damages alleged to have been caused by any of the said saw logs to plaintiffs' property or breakwater. The lumber company, after pleading the general issue, admitted that, since the beginning of the year 1893, they had been under a contract with McEwen & Murray, Limited, which owned and operated a sawmill on the New Canal, in the city of New Orleans, to haul and to tow saw logs from sundry tributary streams emptying into Lake Maurepas, on said lake, through Pass Manchac, on Lake Pontchartrain, into the New Canal, to the sawmill of McEwen & Murray, Limited; that, for the purpose of said towage, the logs are chained together in small quantities, forming what is known in the trade as "cribs," which "cribs" are strong, and chained together, and securely fastened to a strong steam towboat operated by respondents; that with the aforesaid means, and following the above method, said company has successfully towed large numbers of saw logs to the aforesaid sawmill; that the same mode of supplying other sawmills in New Orleans has been successfully carried on by other lines of towboats plying on Lake Pontchartrain, and entering into the New Canal, as aforesaid; that, Lake Pontchartrain being navigable water in the United States, the business of hauling and towing saw logs in the manner above indicated is a lawful trade or occupation, and the towing of logs in said manner is as safe as any other mode of navigation, no logs being ever separated from any tow, and carried beyond the control of the towboat or its crew in large quantities, except in cases of sudden and unforeseen gales of wind and tempests; that on or about the 10th of April, 1893, while the towboat of the respondent company (on board of which the president of the company was in person) was hauling a tow composed of some 207 logs, the towboat and cribs of logs were met by a sudden and severe storm, at a distance of about 1½ miles west of the entrance of the New Canal into Lake Pontchartrain; that, under directions of the president of the company, the boat was anchored at about 11 A. M. of that day, and, through the efforts of her crew, the logs were held together until 1 o'clock of the ensuing night, when, under the increased fury of the storm, the cribs were broken asunder, and the logs of the tow were scattered over the lake, beyond the reach and control of the boat and of her crew, only six logs remaining in the tow, the same being hauled in on the next day; that, on diligent search, respondents discovered that the scattered logs were driven in many different directions, some 95 of which were recovered through parties employed by the company; others being found on shore at Mandeville, in Louisiana; some at Pass Manchac; others at Little Woods, on Lake Pontchartrain; some at the bridge of the plaintiff company; others at the mouth of Bayou St. John; and some 22 were traced to the vicinity of plaintiffs' revetment or breakwater, on the lake shore, where many other logs of different brands were also found; that on three different occasions very serious efforts were made by the respondent company, through competent parties employed for that purpose, and by means of some of its own boats, with all necessary appliances, to pull off and recover the logs which had been driven near plaintiffs' breakwater by a disastrous and terrific storm which struck Lake Pontchartrain and surrounding country on the 1st of October, 1893, but without success, although several hundred dollars were expended by the company in their effort to remove said logs. Respondents denied that they were guilty of any negligence either in losing their aforesaid tow of saw logs, or in making necessary efforts to recover them, and that they were in any manner liable to plaintiffs for damages in the premises. They averred that, under the circumstances, the logs were lawfully lying on the lake shore, and that the breakwater of plaintiffs', having been built on navigable water of the United States, at a point where no harbor lines had been established, was then, and continued to be, an illegal impediment to navigation, and a public nuisance. The district court rendered judgment in favor of the defendants, and against the plaintiffs, rejecting their demand, and they appealed.

Mr. Harry H. Hall, for appellants:

One whose property is borne upon the lands of another by inevitable accident, without his fault or negligence, may elect to abandon the property, in which case he is not liable to the owner of the lands for any injury occasioned by it; or he may elect to receive it, in which latter case he must make good to such owner the damage thus occasioned.

And the same rule applies to vessels or rafts abandoned at sea.

Messrs. Denegre, Blair, & Denegre, for appellees:

Plaintiff has no case either at law or in equity. The damage suffered is damnum abaque injuria, the proximate cause of the injury viz major, the now historical hurricane of October 1, 1893.

No ordinarily prudent man would have apprehended danger from such a cause; and even prudent men cannot be held as negligent for failing to make effective provisions against it.

Negligence is the failure to do what a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily have done under the circumstances of the situation, or doing what such a person under the existing circumstances would not have done. The essence of the fault may lie in omission or commission. The duty is dictated and measured by the exigencies of the situation.

Even if negligence could be attributed to the defendants, the record establishes that the damage inflicted was not the sequence or natural cause; but that the injury was done by an intervening, unexpected, and unnatural event, the cyclone of October, 1893; and that this cyclone was the immediate and proximate cause of the damage, and without which no harm would have been done.

Weeks, Damnum Aboque Injuria, § 115, p. 230.

Nicholls, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In March, 1898, a contract was entered into between McEwen & Murray, Limited, a corporation owning and operating a sawmill on the New Canal, in the city of New Orleans, and the Gulf Lumber Company, by which the latter bound itself to haul and tow the former's saw logs from different points on streams emptying into Lake Maurepas, on said lake, through Pass Manchac, on Lake Pontchartrain, into the New Canal, to the sawmill of the owners. For the purpose of towing, the practice has been to bind 10 or 12 logs together by chains into what are known as "cribs," and to construct a raft with them, by chaining a number of these cribs together. The raft is then fastened securely to the steamboat by which they are to be conveyed. In April, 1893, when one of these rafts was being conveyed by a towboat of the Gulf Company to the city of New Orleans, the boat, when at a point on Lake Pontchartrain, about 1½ miles from the mouth of the New Canal, encountered, in the night-time, a violent storm. Its severity was such as to cause the raft to break loose from the boat, and get beyond the reach of her crew. Before morning it had disappeared from view. The raft finally broke to pieces, some of the cribs retaining their forms, but most of them separating, and the logs of which they were composed scattering in different directions along and across the lake. At what precise time and place the raft broke into pieces does not clearly appear. Many of these logs, and also a number of the cribs, were subsequently found in different localities, miles apart, either grounded upon the shore or upon the sand bars in the lake, which run parallel to the shore at some distance out from it, or lying on the shallow waters between those bars and the shore. The Gulf Lumber Company did not attempt until some time after the storm to ascertain what became of the raft and its different parts. They finally, however, at different dates, between April and the 1st of October, sent out steamboats, properly manned, and with proper appliances, to recover the logs and cribs, if possible. Outside services were also called into requisition. Although many of the logs were recovered by these operations, a portion of them remained still in the lake and upon its shores on the last-mentioned date. A part of these were, doubtless, in front of the revetment which the plaintiff company had built for the protection of their roadbed, and which was constructed at no great distance from the lake shore. On the 1st of October an exceptionally violent storm occurred, which caused the waters of the lake to rise, and to beat in an extraordinary manner upon the shore in front of the plaintiffs' revetment. The direction of the wind and waves was such as to drive logs which were in the lake in the vicinity of the plaintiffs' revetment upon it, and to batter it down in a number of places, not only injuring the revetment, and necessitating its repair, but also injuring the road embankment by the washing of the waves upon it, through the open spaces of the broken revetment. After the damage had been done, a correspondence took place between the plaintiff company and the defendants in reference to a number of logs which the former asserted, "drifting in Lake Pontchartrain, had floated against their revetment work and their embankment, between Little Woods and the city, where they were a menace to the revetment in case of another storm." The plaintiffs wrote that they had been informed that the logs belonged to McEwen & Murray, Limited; that, if such was the fact, they asked McEwen & Murray to remove them at their earliest possible convenience. The plaintiff company also wrote to the defendants, claiming that the injury already done to the revetment and embankment had been caused through the negligence of McEwen & Murray, and that of the Gulf Lumber Company, by logs belonging to the former, notifying them that they proposed to repair the damage done, and to hold both defendants responsible for the cost of repair. The repairs were afterwards made, and it is admitted that the amount claimed is correct, if it be legally due. The Gulf Lumber Company, replying to the letters written by the plaintiffs in relation to the logs then on the lake shore, stated that all the logs branded "M" belonged to McEwen & Murray, but were in the writers' care until they got them at the mill; that the logs which were scattered from Milneburg to the railroad got away from them during a high sea, and that so far they had been unable to get them; that they were then getting a small boat in readiness with which to get them off; and that they expected to get them off in the next ten or fifteen days. They denied that the logs had gotten away from them by negligence, and asserted that their getting away had entailed loss on them. In February of 1894, McEwen & Murray wrote the plaintiffs, in reply to a letter written on the 30th of January, 1894, that the Gulf Lumber Company had been unable to get the logs on the North-eastern tracks, on account of boats being broken, and also low water; that they would go over there in a short time, and get them off; that the matter would receive their close attention. On the 1st of February, 1894, the Gulf Lumber Company wrote the plaintiffs that they had gone down, and made an effort to get the logs, but the water was so shallow they could not reach them, but that, as soon as they got high water, they would be after them, for they wanted them badly. On the 3d of February, the plaintiffs wrote the Gulf Company that, unless they indicated a reasonable time within which they would undertake to remove the logs which threatened the revetment, the railroad company would be forced to relieve their works of the threatened danger, at the expense of the Gulf Company; that, situated as the logs were, they would again very seriously damage the revetment in case of a storm; that, while it was true it would be less expensive to remove the logs during high water than at the then stage of water, the risk of damage to the plaintiffs' works should be taken into consideration. They therefore called on the company to inform them positively whether they would remove the logs within a time which they would indicate and fix.

On the 9th the Gulf Company announced that it would be impossible for them to remove the logs at that time, or to name a date when they would do so; that all that they could say was that they were very anxious to have the logs, and that, as soon as the water would permit a boat not drawing over 4 feet of water to get within 800 feet of them, they would do so. On the 12th the plaintiffs notified the Gulf Lumber Company that, unless the logs lying in front of the revetment which protected their tracks were removed by the 1st of March, they would, in order to protect their works against the damage which would inevitably follow from the logs being thrown against the works by a storm or high water, cut up and remove them, at that company's risk and expense, and that they would hold them responsible for any damage that might occur in the meantime. On the 15th of the month, the attorney of the Gulf Company wrote plaintiffs that his clients had, since a portion of their logs had been blown by the terrific storm which swept over this portion of the state in September (October) in the proximity of the railroad company's revetment, made three serious efforts, with all the means at their command, to reach and remove the logs, but that, owing to the stage of the water at that point, their attempts had been unsuccessful. They suggested to the plaintiffs that, as they had better access to the logs than his clients had, they might be cut up into useful materials. They therefore proposed to the plaintiffs to sell them the logs at a price much below their real value as saw logs. Plaintiffs declined to make the purchase, but stated that, if the logs could be cut up into such lengths as would be useful and available to the Gulf Company, they would receive any suggestions which that company would make to that effect. On the 23d of February plaintiffs' attorney wrote to defendants' counsel a letter substantially to the same effect, stating additionally that, unless the logs were removed by the 1st of March, the railroad company would be compelled to have them cut up and removed. This letter was followed by a reply from defendants' counsel, in which, after referring to the declaration made that the plaintiffs would, after the 1st of March, cut up and remove the logs, he said, on behalf of his clients, that they earnestly protested against the cutting up of their logs by the railroad company, or any person acting under their orders or authority; that, before doing so, their attention was directed to the provisions of act No. 104 of 1892; and that their clients intended to prosecute all offenders under the terms of that statute.

We find nothing in the record which justifies a charge of negligence in the Gulf Lumber Company in losing their logs on the night of the 10th of April. We think "its loss was occasioned by accidental and uncontrollable events," without their fault, and that, under the terms of article 2754, Rev. Civ. Code, they were absolved from liability at that time and for that fact. Plaintiffs contend that it was the duty of the defendants to have immediately followed up the raft, and secured it. Had any loss or damage resulted to third parties at that time by reason of the rafts being adrift, when, by proper and timely efforts, they could have been recovered, we would have been called on to say whether, under the circumstances shown to have then existed, the company were under legal obligation to take the course which plaintiffs maintain it was their imperative duty to have followed, or whether they were entitled to invoke the same rule which is laid down in reference to the owners of vessels sunk through unavoidable accident in navigable waters. We find it announced that, "where a vessel is sunk through an unavoidable accident in navigable water the owner is not obliged to remove the wreck, nor is he liable for injuries it may cause to others, nor indictable for maintaining a nuisance, although navigation is obstructed." 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, verbo Wreck, p. 995; 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 738.

There is no one before us claiming to have received injury or to have been damaged at that time by a failure of the Gulf Company to take immediate steps to ascertain what had become of the detached raft, and there is nothing which would authorize us to say that, if such steps had been taken, the raft could have been then found, or found under such conditions as would have brought about a result different from that which actually occurred. Plaintiffs contend, however, that, even if defendants were not originally liable for the damages which would follow from the situation and condition of the different parts of the raft at a later date, they have made themselves so liable by reason of the fact that, instead of abandoning the cribs and logs, they have insisted upon their continued ownership of the same. They invoke on their behalf the principal doctrine announced in the concluding sentence of the extract from the American & English Encyclopedia of Law which we have quoted, and which is to the effect that "if, however [the owner], instead of abandoning the wreck, . . . retains possession, he is liable for any injuries arising from his failure to take proper precautions for the public safety." See 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 738.

Plaintiffs refer us to §§ 1614-1616, 1 Domat, Civil Law, Cushing's ed., where, under the chapter in which the author deals "of the consequences of the engagements which are formed by accidents," he says: "The proprietor of a ground on which is thrown the rubbish of a building that is fallen down, or that which a flood hath carried away from another's ground, is obliged to suffer him who has had the loss to take away what remains, and to allow him such free access to his ground as is necessary for that end. But upon the conditions that are explained in the following articles." § 1614. "In the cases of the foregoing article, he who desires to have back the materials of his building that is fallen down, or that which a flood hath carried away from his land and thrown upon another man's ground, is obliged, on his part, not only to indemnify the proprietor of said ground as to what damage shall happen to be done by his taking away the things which have been thrown upon it, but he is, moreover, bound to repair all the damage which has been already done to the ground by the things since they were cast upon it. But if he choose rather not to take away anything, he will owe nothing; for if he abandons to the proprietor of that ground all that has been cast upon it, he is not bound to make good a damage that has happened by the bare effect of that accident; and it is enough that he loses what the accident has carried away from him." § 1615. "If he whose materials or other things have been thrown by these accidents on the estate of another person be desirous to take them away, he will be obliged, besides the making reparation for the damage sustained by the owner of the ground, to take away as well the unprofitable stuff that can be of no manner of use, as that which is useful and which he is desirous to take away, and to clear entirely the surface of the ground on which the things have been thrown." § 1616.

We will refer to this particular matter later. For the present, we go back to an examination of the conduct of these defendants in the interval between their first discovering traces of the missing raft, up to the date of the storm of October 1, 1893. It was unquestionably not the intention of the defendants to surrender their ownership of the logs which had scattered which they could locate and identify. They made very sincere and earnest efforts to recover and save them, not on account of any danger to be apprehended to special individuals or to the public generally by reason of their situation, but because of the value which they were deemed by the owner to have relatively to the expense necessary to redeem them. We take it for granted that, had they been of the opinion that this value would not have justified any attempt at all at their recovery, none would have been made, but they would have been abandoned; also, that they never intended that an attempt would be made to retake logs found which were on examination, ascertained to be in such a special condition as not to warrant the expenditure of money needed to accomplish it. We think it can be fairly assumed that, while not abandoning for the time being any of their property, the owners proposed to ultimately abandon such portions of it as could be secured only by an unreasonable outlay of money. While we think it might have been possible, at very great expense, and by taking advantage of special stages of water and wind, to have removed all the logs by boat, we do not think the situation was such that owners, simply as owners, could have been reasonably expected to take any more active steps than they did towards regaining the logs. They might, perhaps, have been brought in to the shore, and there cut into pieces, as was suggested at one time; but defendants were engaged in the business of operating a sawmill, and not of selling wood, and the logs would have had but little value to them when cut up. In dealing with the acts of the defendants in this matter, we have therefore to ascertain whether, independently of any question of value and expenditure, they were under a legal obligation, for the safety of either special individuals or of the public generally, to do more than they did in the premises. Defendants were not at fault for the escape of the raft. They had no agency whatever in respect to the particular places where the cribs and logs were lodged by the winds and waves, nor in determining the particular conditions in which they were there lodged. If for the conditions existing at the time of the October storm they were liable at all, it was not for acts of commission, but of omission. The conditions per se were not such as to lead anyone to look forward to probable danger or damage in the near future. Even the possibility of danger was remote. The conduct of the plaintiffs prior to the storm indicates no apprehension by them of damage likely to arise from logs on their immediate front. Had they entertained such apprehension, they would have called upon the defendants earlier than they did, or themselves taken the initiative, and removed the logs, taking the risk of recovering the expense therefor from the defendants. They certainly would not have allowed the comparatively small expenditure which they would have had to make to stand in the way of a threatened serious danger. The correspondence which followed the storm might be pertinent on a claim for future damage, but it has little effect in disposing of matters in the past.

In considering the question of the liability of the defendants to the plaintiffs for not actually and actively removing the logs from the lake front prior to the storm, the plaintiffs must bear in mind that they took upon themselves certain risks in placing their roadbed and revetment where they did. Their position, where placed, was of course legal; but none the less they were exposed, from necessity, to the possibility of just such a condition of affairs as happened. The lake has constantly upon it driftwood and logs reaching it from streams which run into Lake Maurepas through Pass Manchac. The precise point at which these logs and this driftwood may be when a storm arises is a matter of pure accident, as is the precise point where they may be during the storm and at its close. The particular logs which may batter down plaintiffs' revetment during a storm need by no manner of means be those which are on its front at its commencement. Those may be carried out either to do a work of destruction elsewhere, or none at all. The result would be a matter of chance, dependent upon the violence of the wind and its particular direction. The presence of logs on the front may, under extraordinary combination of circumstances, add to the danger of the situation; but we think we can say from the evidence in the record that this danger would be only exceptional. Plaintiffs' revetment has been in front of their embankment since 1886, without serious, if any, injury to it. Nothing but a storm of the extraordinary character of that of the 1st of October, with its special accompanying conditions, would bring about such a result as the plaintiffs complain of. The district judge, in his judgment, referring to it, said: "The storm of October was not an ordinary storm, such as an ordinarily prudent man would expect and be bound to provide against. Upon the contrary, it was a most extraordinary storm, the equal of which in fury and destructiveness has never but once been known or heard of in this country,—an event of such infrequent and remarkable character that even prudent men cannot be held as negligent for failing to make effective provision against it. If, instead of leaving logs grounded in front of the revetment, there had been heavy flat boats or other vessels moored there, and secured as ordinarily prudent men would secure such craft, the result, in all probability, would have been the same. Ordinary fastenings would have been of no avail as against the phenomenal gale of October 1, and the boats would have been converted into implements of destruction, just as the logs were." "Negligence consists in a failure to provide against the ordinary occurrences of life, and the fact that the provision made is insufficient as against an event such as may happen once in a lifetime, or perhaps twice in a century, does not, in my opinion, make out a case of negligence upon which an action in damages will lie."

We do not think that, as a matter of law, defendants were guilty of negligence per se in not removing the logs from the lake shore prior to the 1st of October. To hold them negligent, if at all, the attendant facts and circumstances of the case would have to be shown, so as, from all the facts, it could be seen that defendants were in fault. Plaintiffs do not claim that if defendants had absolutely abandoned the logs, not being in fault in losing them at the beginning, they could have any recourse against them for damages. They charge that the storm of October found a certain condition upon its immediate front, for which condition defendants were responsible, by reason of their claim of the ownership of the logs, and of their being held as such owners to a legal obligation to safeguard it and the public against all dangers to result from their situation. The raft did not remain in its entirety. The logs of which it was composed were scattered for miles along the shore. The defendants can scarcely be said to have retained possession of them, or to have held possession of any logs other than the particular ones which they might be attempting to remove, and then only so long as they were working to that end upon them. It was impossible that they should retain any greater possession or longer possession of the same than this. It was impossible for them to guard them in the lake. We do not think that by directing their attention to such logs as admitted of being removed, and removing them, defendants bound themselves for the removal of such as could be removed only by extraordinary methods and at unreasonable expense, either absolutely or within any special time. We think they were authorized to abandon, as we have no doubt they always intended to abandon, such as could be removed only under such circumstances. Defendants never claimed the logs which were thrown inside of plaintiffs' revetment upon their embankment, or upon any of their land. Those which were cast upon their land are there yet, unclaimed;

so that the passage from Domat finds no application in the facts of the case. We think that defendants' efforts in the direction of removing the logs (if it was their duty to do so) were as great as could be expected, and made as promptly as could be expected. 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 788. They are chargeable with no act of omission or of negligence for which they can be made legally answerable in damages to the plaintiffs. In Hanson v. Mansfield R. & Transp. Co. 38 La. Ann. 117, 58 Am. Rep. 162, this court declared that "negligence," in its common acceptation, was held to be "the doing of something that a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily not have done under the circumstances of the situation, or the omission to do something which a person of like character would have done under the circumstances of the case." The Supreme Court of the United States, in Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Jones, 95 U. S. 441, 24 L. ed. 507, gave to the term substantially the same definition, adding that "the duty is dictated and measured by the exigencies of the occasion." In order to render a person chargeable in damages for an act of omission or commission on his part, the act complained of must have been the proximate cause of the damage. In Huber v. La Crosse City R. Co. 92 Wis. 686, 81 L. R. A. 583, the supreme court of Wisconsin, affirming what had been previously declared by it in Block v. Milwaukee Street R. Co. 89 Wis. 371, 27 L. R. A. 365, said: "The negligence is not the proximate cause of the accident unless, under all the circumstances, the accident might have been reasonably foreseen by a man of ordinary intelligence and prudence. It is not enough to prove that the accident is the natural consequence of the negligence. It must also have been the probable consequence. Atkinson v. Goodrich Transp. Co. 60 Wis. 141, 50 Am. Rep. 352; Barton v. Pepin County Agri. Soc. 83 Wis. 19; McGowan v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 91 Wis. 147. A mere failure to ward against a result which could not have been reasonably expected is not actionable negligence." A condition is ordinarily a remote cause, and it was so in this instance. See also Davis v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 93 Wis. 470, 33 L. R. A. 654.

We are of the opinion that the judgment is correct, and it is hereby affirmed.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

LAKE SHORE & MICHIGAN SOUTH-ERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Pff. in Err.,

v.

Sarah B. ORNDORFF.

(55 Ohio St. 589.)

*1. When a person having in charge a child of sufficient age to require payment of fare takes passage on a railroad, such person becomes liable for the payment of the child's fare, and, upon refusal to pay, both may be ejected from the train at the next station.

2. When such person has paid fare, or purchased a ticket which is taken up by the conductor, such conductor must, before ejecting such person and child, return or offer to return to such person the unused value of such ticket or

* Headnotes by the COURT.

NOTE.—Ejection of custodian for nonpayment of child's fare.

The cases upon this question have been very few. In several cases the railroad authorities have not attempted to expel the guardian of the child from the train, but have expelled the child himself, and the guardian has voluntarily left with the child. Such action of the railroad authorities has generally been upheld.

The child may be removed from the train in case the fare for him is not paid. Beckwith v. Cheshire R. Co. 143 Mass. 68. In that case the counsel argued that the contract was with the guardian, of the child and that she, and not the child, was the one who should be put off, or, at least, both of them should be put off; but this argument did not prevail with the court.

The conductor may expel from the train children fare over and above the fares of both for the distance already traveled.

3. If the ticket is such that a stop-over may be had thereon, the conductor may tender a stop-over check instead of money, but to retain the ticket and expel the parties from the train render the company liable in damages.

(January 26, 1897.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Fulton County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for alleged illegal ejection from defendant's train. Affirmed.

Statement by Burket, J.:

In the month of September, 1891, Sarah B. Orndorff, defendant in error purchased a ticket for herself from Kendallville, in the for whom fare is not paid if they are of such age that under the rules of the company they should pay fare. Pittsburg, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Dewin, 83 Ill. 296.

In Cox v. Los Angeles Terminal R. Co. 109 Cal. 100, where a girl ten years old and her two younger sisters entered the train, and she offered two full fares for the three, which the conductor refused to take, but offered to take it for two, saying the other must leave the cars, whereupon the one who offered the fare elected to get off also, it was held she had no right of action for expulsion from the train, since her act was voluntary.

But in a case where the conductor ejected a boy who was traveling on a half fare ticket because he thought him over the age which was entitled to ride on such tickets, and the mother left the train with him, the court said the ejection of state of Indiana, to Wauseon, in the state of Ohio, and got aboard one of the regular passenger trains of the plaintiff in error, and took with her into the car her little boy, aged nine years. The conductor came around, and took up her ticket, and punched it, and demanded half fare for the boy, which she refused to pay. He informed her that she must pay half fare for the boy, or both get off at the next station, Corunna, 8 miles east. Upon arriving at Corunna, she still refused to pay, and also refused to get off, and he thereupon removed her and the boy as gently as possible, using no unnecessary force; she at the same time demanding the return of her ticket, and he refusing to return the same, as it was already canceled. After she and the boy had been put out onto the platform of the station, she offered to pay the boy's fare, and they again got upon the train, and she paid his fare, and they rode in safety to Wauseon, where they left the train and went to their home. The ticket was what is known as a "stop-over ticket," entitling her to a stop-over check at any station. She afterwards commenced an action against the railroad company for damages for unlawfully ejecting her from the train; resulting in personal injury, and shocking and wounding her feelings. Upon trial in the common-pleas court she recovered a judgment for $700, which was reduced to $400 by the circuit court, and then affirmed.

Upon the trial the counsel for the railroad company requested the court to charge the jury as follows: "(1) The plaintiff, Sarah B. Orndorff, being a passenger upon defendant's train, was responsible for the fare of a child under her charge and control, and upon plaintiff's refusal to pay the railroad fare of such child, the defendant, by its officers and agents, had the right to remove both plaintiff and the child from the train, although plaintiff had paid her own fare, and the conductor had refused to return same to her. (2) In this case, the minor child was accompanying his mother from Kendallville to Wauseon, and boarded the train with his mother at Kendallville, was in plaintiff's charge and under her control, and she was, in law, responsible for his presence in the car, and it was plaintiff's duty, in law, to see that his fare was paid. The defendant was under no obligation to carry the boy without being paid therefor, and had a right to demand the fare of the plaintiff, and, upon refusal so to do, the defendant had a right to remove both from the train. (3) If, in effecting such removal, the conductor used no more force than was necessary to overcome the resistance made by the plaintiff, and therein did no bodily injury, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and your verdict should be for the defendant. (4) It was the duty of the plaintiff, after refusing to pay the fare of her minor son, to leave the train at Corunna, after notice so to do by the conductor, and, upon refusing so to do, the conductor was justified in removing her therefrom, using no more force than was necessary to accomplish the same." The court refused to charge as requested, and proper exceptions were taken to such refusal.

The court charged the jury as to the right of the conductor to eject her and her boy from the train as follows: "When the conductor demanded of the plaintiff that she pay the fare of or furnish a ticket for the child in her charge, her own child, it was her duty so to do, and, upon her refusal, and persisting in such refusal, the conductor had a right at the first station to stop and remove both her and the child from the train, if she refused to get off without such removal, providing, however, that he first restored or offered to restore to her the unearned value of the ticket he had taken from her for the ride from Kendallville to Wauseon. Therefore, before exercising the right to eject her from the car, and before ejecting her from the train, it was his duty to either tender her the ticket he had taken, and demand the regular fare of herself and child for the distance they had already ridden, or, if he retained the ticket, to tender her the difference between the price paid for the ticket at Kendallville and the regular fare of herself and child from Kendallville to Corunna, or tender her a stop-over check for herself from Corunna to Wauseon and demand the fare of the child from Kendallville to Corunna. If he did none of these things, but retained her ticket, and, while so retaining her ticket, he ejected the plaintiff and her child from the cars at Corunna, and while in the line of his duty as defendant's employee, and as such agent or conductor, then she will be entitled to a verdict at your hands."

Proper exceptions were taken to this charge by counsel for the railroad company, and a motion filed for a new trial, which was overruled. The judgment having been affirmed by the boy was the same thing as the ejection of the mother, as it was unreasonable to ask her to leave the child under the circumstances and proceed on her own ticket. Gibson v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 30 Fed. Rep. 904.

And in Austin v. Great Western R. Co. L. R. 2 Q. B. 442, which was a case for injury to the child, the court says that the contract was with the mother, and that if there was any fraud in not paying for the child, it was that of the mother, and not that of the child.

In only one case prior to LAKE SHORE & M. S. R. Co. v. ORNDORFF does the question seem to have been squarely raised, and that was Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Hoeftich, 62 Md. 300, 50 Am. Rep. 223, where the court holds that the person having charge of a child may be put off the train for refusing to pay fare for the child, although she had paid her own fare. The court says the law would imply an agreement on her part to pay the fare of the child, and if she refused to pay it the carrier had a right to put off both the guardian and the child, the guardian because she had not complied with the contract on her part implied by law, and the child because the carrier was not required to carry it unless its fare was paid. But in that case it appeared that the one ejected from the train was not in fact the guardian of the child, and so was wrongfully put off the train.

In a subsequent case it was held that the fact that a person over twenty-one years of age had disposed of his ticket would not authorize the expulsion of his father from the train for nonpayment of his fare, although the father procured the ticket for him originally, the court holding that the authorities which justify the expulsion of a person in charge of a child from the train for nonpayment of the child's fare do not apply. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Mabin, 66 Miss. 63.

the circuit court, a petition in error was filed in this court, seeking to reverse the judgments below.

Messrs. E. D. Potter, Thomas Emery and George C. Green for plaintiff in error.

Mr. W. W. Touville for defendant in error.

Burket, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

If the charge of the court as given was right, there was no error to the prejudice of the railroad company in the refusal to charge as requested. In the charge as given the court fully conceded the right of the conductor to eject the defendant in error for nonpayment of fare for her boy, but held it to be his duty, before ejecting her, to restore or offer to restore to her the unused value of her ticket over and above the fare of both from Kendallville to Corunna. While the court held the conductor to this duty, it gave him the option to perform the duty either by returning the ticket and demanding the fare of both for the distance already traveled, or by tendering a stop-over check for herself from Corunna to Wauseon, and demanding fare for the child from Kendallville to Corunna, or by tendering her the difference in money between the price of the ticket and the fare of both from Kendallville to Corunna. This charge conceded to the company all its rights, if not more.

Upon her refusing to pay fare for the boy, the company had a right to put both off the train at the next station, and collect fare for the boy at that station, but it had no right to confiscate her ticket to Wauseon, and appropriate the same to its own use without compensation to her. Before putting her off the cars, the conductor should have returned to her the unused value of her ticket, either by paying such value to her in money, or by giving her a stop-over check and collecting fare for the boy for the distance already traveled. If the ticket was already canceled, so as not to avail her on another train, its return would have been of no value to her, and this the company knew, while she may not have known it. In such case it was the duty of the conductor to give her a stop-over check, or compensate her in money to the amount of the difference between the cost of the ticket and the fares of both to Corunna. As between her and the company, the conductor represented the company, and the rights and liabilities of the parties were the same as if the company had been present and transacted the business through its highest officers; and therefore neither the inconvenient ence of making change, nor the want of authority on the part of the conductor to pay the unused value of the canceled ticket, can shield the company from liability. As the ticket was such as to entitle the holder to a stop-over at any station, the contract of carriage was not an entire but a severable contract; and upon notice to the conductor that she desired to stop at an intermediate station, it was his duty to give her a stop-over check; and, when he was about to forcibly eject her from the train, it was still more his duty to give her such check. It was his duty before commencing to eject her from the train, to either pay her the unused value of her ticket over and above the fares of both for the distance already traveled, or give her a stop-over check and demand the fare of the boy, and, if this had been done, she would most likely have paid the boy's fare, and avoided the disagreeable scene which followed. At all events, it was her right to have the unused value of her ticket restored to her before being ejected from the train. True, she was in the wrong in refusing to pay fare for the boy, but the company was also in the wrong in retaining the unused value of her ticket, and in ejecting her before returning or offering to return to her such value, either in money or stop-over check. Her wrong did not warrant the company in expelling her from the train without returning to her the remaining value of her ticket. The expulsion was therefore unlawful, and the company became liable to respond in damages.

There is always liable to be more or less friction between the traveling public and transportation companies, and, while railroads should be fully protected in the enforcement of their reasonable rules, passengers must be protected in their rights of property, and against unreasonable annoyances. The case of Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Hoeflich, 62 Md. 300, 50 Am. Rep. 223, and Wood, Railway Law, § 353, cited by plaintiff in error, only go to the extent that, upon refusal to pay fare for a child, both the child and the person having it in charge may be ejected from the train. Nothing is there said as to the right to have the unused fare returned. The charge of the court in the case at bar fully conceded all that is covered by these two authorities. The following cases are in point, and throw some light upon the question under consideration in this case: Wardwell v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 46 Minn. 514, 13 L. R. A. 596; Bland v. Southern P. R. Co. 55 Cal. 570, 36 Am. Rep. 50; Van Kirk v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 76 Pa. 66, 18 Am. Rep. 404.

We find no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

James P. RANDALL

v.

James E. TUELL.

(89 Me. 443.)

An innholder who has no license cannot recover for board and lodging furnished by him in such inn, under Rev. Stat. chap. 27, declaring that "no person shall be a common innholder or victualer without a license under a penalty of not more than $50," and requiring a license fee of only $1, since the purpose of the statute is to protect the public, and not merely to obtain revenue.

(January 5, 1897.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Kennebec County made during the trial of an action to recover for board furnished by plaintiff to defendant, holding that the action was maintainable. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Heath & Andrews, for defendant:

In some cases it has been held that where a license is for the protection of the public and to prevent improper persons from engaging in a particular business, and the license is not for revenue merely, a contract made by an unlicensed person in violation of the act is void. In other cases, however, this rule has not been applied, and the contracts of unlicensed persons have been held valid.

13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 516.

It cannot be contended that the statute is in any sense for revenue. The fee required (Rev. Stat. chap. 27, § 4) is $1, not enough to pay the expenses of the licensing board.

The plaintiff admitted that the acts and services performed constituting his cause of action were all acts and services sufficient to convict him of a violation of Rev. Stat. chap. 27, §§ 1-14.

He cannot recover for acts and services done and goods furnished in plain violation of a penal statute.

Harding v. Hager, 60 Me. 340; Lord v. Jones, 24 Me. 439, 41 Am. Dec. 391; Stanwood v. Woodward, 88 Me. 192; Brett v. Marston, 45 Me. 401; Norcross v. Norcross, 58 Me. 163; Atwater v. Sawyer, 76 Me. 589, 49 Am. Rep. 634; Durgin v. Dyer, 68 Me. 143; Mace v. Putnam, 71 Me. 238; Meador v. White, 66 Me. 90, 22 Am. Rep. 551; Plaisted v. Palmer, 63 Me. 576; Benjamin, Sales, Corbin's ed. § 825; Benne's 1893 ed. § 538.

When the statute has in view the protection of the public health or morals, or the prevention of frauds by the person who is required to procure a license, then, though there be nothing but the penalty, a contract which infringes it cannot be enforced.

Le Clerc Bois Valon, 2 Campb. 144; Johnson v. Hudson, 11 East, 180; Smith v. Marwood, 14 Mees. & W. 452.

In Cope v. Rowlands, 2 Mees. & W. 157, the revenue distinction was overruled, the court saying that if the contract be rendered illegal it can make no difference in point of law whether the statute which has made it so has in view the protection of the revenue or any other object.

In Holt v. Green, 78 Pa. 196, 18 Am. Rep. 737, the court held the contract void.

In Best v. Bauder, 29 How. Pr. 439, the United States revenue laws requiring peddlers to be licensed were held to be prohibitory.

In Corning v. Abbott, 54 N. H. 469, and in Ruckman v. Bergholz, 87 N. J. L. 437, the same statutes were held to have been for revenue purposes only, and contracts by unlicensed persons sustained.

The revenue test was applied, and contracts of unlicensed persons held unenforceable in Griffith v. Wells, 3 Denio, 226, and Ferdon v. Cunningham, 20 How. Pr. 154.

Under a statute saying that it shall not be lawful for persons to exercise the business of brokers without a license, one who sold stocks without a license cannot maintain an action for his commissions.

Hustis v. Pickands, 27 Ill. App. 270.

Under a statute requiring attorneys at law to be licensed, an unlicensed attorney was not allowed to recover for his services.

A penalty inflicted by a statute upon an offense implies a prohibition, and a contract relating to it is void, even where it is not expressly declared by the statute that the contract is void.

The revenue test is to be applied only where there is doubt from the language of the statute itself whether or not the legislature intended to prohibit the exercise of the privilege without a license.

Stevenson v. Ewing, 87 Tenn. 46.

A contract for shingles not surveyed as required by law was held void.

Any person is a common innholder who keeps a public house of entertainment for all who choose to visit it.

Wintermute v. Clark, 5 Sandf. 247; Taylor v. Monnot, 4 Duer, 116.

The rule of law, said Parker, Ch. J., in Russell v. De Grand, 15 Mass. 85, 89, is of universal operation that none shall by the aid of a court of justice obtain the fruits of an unlawful bargain.

Messrs. Whitehouse & Fisher, for plaintiff:

To decide that an unlicensed innkeeper cannot collect debts due to him for board and lodgings furnished would be inflicting an additional penalty not contemplated by the legislature, or authorized by the law.

The statute does not make contracts of unlicensed innkeepers void.

Forfeitures and confiscation of honest debts must be the result of express legislation; these are not to be implied.

Burbank v. McDuffee, 65 Me. 185. Harris v. Runnells, 58 U. S. 12 How. 79, 13 L. ed. 901.

In Norcross v. Norcross, 58 Me. 163, it was held that a suit could be maintained against an unlicensed innkeeper, and the court said: "A license does not change the character of the business of those who entertain travelers."

Atwater v. Sawyer, 76 Me. 541, 49 Am. Rep. 634.

If an unlicensed innkeeper is subject to all the liabilities of an innkeeper to his guests it would seem no more than right and just that his guests should be under obligation to pay him for his services rendered.

Foster, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question presented in this case is whether an innholder, who has no license, under Rev. Stat. chap. 27, can recover for board and lodging furnished by him in such inn.

While the statute contains no express provision declaring contracts by an unlicensed innholder to be void, it does by § 13 expressly provide that "no person shall be a common innholder or victualer without a license, under a penalty of not more than $50."

It is the general doctrine, now settled by the great weight of authority, that where a license is required for the protection of the public, and to prevent improper persons from engaging in a particular business, and the license is not for revenue merely, a contract made by an unlicensed person in violation of the act is void.

Did the legislature, by the requirement of a license, intend to prohibit the exercise of the business without a license, or was the statute enacted for revenue purposes only?

88 J. R. A.

It can hardly be contended that the statute is in any sense for mere revenue. The fee required is only $1. The licensee must show that he is a man of good moral character, must give bond not to violate the prohibitory law, and must allow no gambling on his premises. The legislative intent is best inferred from the language of the statute itself. The statute is explicitly prohibitory, and the license required is clearly for the protection of the public, and to prevent improper persons from engaging in a particular business.

This question has come before the courts, not only in this, but in other states, and the great trend of authority is in but one direction.

The same principle was established in Harding v. Bagar, 60 Me. 340. There the plaintiff was a commercial broker, within the meaning of a statute of the United States, which provided that no person should be engaged in prosecuting or carrying on any trade, business, or profession thereafter mentioned until he should obtain a license therefor, under a penalty. That statute contained no express provision declaring the contracts of unlicensed persons void. Like the statute under consideration, it prohibited unlicensed employments. Suit was brought to recover for services as broker, and in the course of the opinion Kent, J., says: "It is too well settled to require the citation of authorities, that no party can recover for acts or services done in direct contravention of an express statute, or for property sold and delivered. When the case develops such forbidden acts, unless protected by a license or authority, it is incumbent on the plaintiff to show such license."

The same question was determined, authorities reviewed, and the principle affirmed in Harding v. Bagar, 68 Me. 515. In Stanwood v. Woodward, 88 Me. 192, an innholder without license sought to establish a lien for board upon the property of a guest committed to his charge, and the want of a license was held to be fatal to his claim.

This case falls within the rule laid down by this court in Durgin v. Dyer, 69 Me. 143, where the court says: "The rule is well established that contracts for the sale of chattels entered into in contravention of the terms and policy of a statute cannot be enforced; and it is immaterial whether the sale is expressly prohibited, or a penalty imposed therefor, because the imposition of a penalty in such case implies prohibition."

So, under a statute which in terms provides that "whoever offers for sale or shipment any pressed hay not marked" as required by law "forfeits $1 for each bale so offered, to be recovered by complaint," this court has held that contracts for the sale of such hay were void. Buxton v. Hamblen, 82 Me. 448. The court there says that "the statute though not in express terms, yet by unavoidable inference, prohibits every such sale." Pickard v. Bayley, 46 Me. 200.

A contract for shingles not surveyed as required by law was held void in Richmond v. Foss, 77 Me. 590, although the statute contained no express prohibition.

In Cope v. Rowlands, 2 Mees. & W. 149, it was held that a person acting as a broker without license could not recover his commissions, where the statute required a license, and imposed a penalty for its violation. "It is perfectly settled," says Baron Parke, "that where the contract which the plaintiff seeks to enforce, be it express or implied, is expressly or by implication forbidden by the common or statute law, no court will lend its assistance to give it effect. It is equally clear that a contract is void if prohibited by a statute, though the statute inflicts a penalty only, because such a penalty implies a prohibition."

In Massachusetts the decisions are numerous that where a statute imposes a penalty for a failure to comply with its provisions, it is to be construed as prohibitory, and that contracts made in direct contravention of its requirements are unlawful and void. Miller v. Post, 1 Allen, 484,—where milk was sold by the can, and the cans were not sealed; Libby v. Downey, 5 Allen, 299,—where coal was sold without being weighed by a sworn weigher; Sawyer v. Smith, 109 Mass. 220,—hay sold without being weighed as required by statute; Prescott v. Butterby, 119 Mass. 285,—lumber sold without being properly surveyed.

The same doctrine was affirmed in Illinois in Hustis v. Pickands, 27 Ill. App. 270, where, under a statute making it unlawful for persons to exercise the business of brokers without a license, it was held that one who sold stocks without a license could not maintain an action for his commissions. And also in Tedrick v. Hiner, 61 Ill. 189.

Also in Pennsylvania, in Johnson v. Hulings, 103 Pa. 498, 49 Am. Rep. 181; Holt v. Green, 73 Pa. 198.

In California, where it is made a misdemeanor for a person to practise medicine without a license, an action will not lie to recover for services so rendered. Gardner v. Tatum, 81 Cal. 370.

In Tennessee the court say that the revenue test is to be applied only where there is doubt from the language of the statute itself whether or not the legislature intended to prohibit the exercise of the privilege without a license, and that under a statute providing that the business of a real-estate broker shall not be pursued without a license it was held that an unlicensed broker could not recover his commission. Steenerson v. Ewing, 87 Tenn. 46.

If the statute in question was enacted for revenue purposes only, instead of being prohibitory, the plaintiff might properly recover. But we are satisfied that such was not the intention of the legislature. The statute being by implication prohibitory by reason of the penalty attached, the plaintiff is precluded from recovering. Basing his action upon a clear violation of the statute, he cannot successfully invoke the aid of the court. Miller v. Post, 1 Allen, 484.

Exceptions sustained.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Sophie C. ROGERS et al.

v.

Loring W. BARNES.

(.....Mass.....)

1. An action for the wrongful execution of the power of sale contained in a mortgage does not arise from any injury to real property, but is transitory.
2. A mortgagor can recover the damages sustained by him from the wrongful execution of a power of sale in the mortgage when there was no default, even if the sale was an absolute nullity, if a subsequent transfer has placed the property in the hands of a purchaser for value with a title which appears perfect on the records and constitutes a cloud on the mortgagor's title.
3. A parol ratification by a mortgagor of a void sale under a power in the mortgage is sufficient to confirm the title of a bona fide purchaser who has bought the land in reliance upon the records which showed an apparently good title.
4. A mortgagee cannot sell the land under a power of sale when there has been no default of breach of the conditions of the mortgage, so as to pass a good title, even to a bona fide purchaser for value or to any subsequent purchaser from him.

5. A mortgagor may elect to recover full damages on account of the unlawful sale of the land under a power of sale in the mortgage when there was no default, and thus ratify the title of a purchaser who had bought the land for value in good faith, although he might instead repudiate the sale and redeem the premises.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action to recover damages for the alleged illegal foreclosure of a mortgage. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Moses S. Case, for defendant:

This action was local and could only have been tried in the county where the land lay. 1 Chitty, Pl. 16th Am. ed. 280; 1 Chitty, Pl. 17th ed. 458, 459; Warren v. Webb, 1 Taunt. 379.

Field, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's declaration contained three counts. The substance of the first count, which is in tort, is that the plaintiff made a mortgage dated March 2, 1893, to the defendant of a parcel of land to secure the payment of $1,200 in one year from said date, with interest thereon payable semiannually; that there was no default in the performance of the conditions of the mortgage, but that on October 16, 1893, the defendant sold the mortgaged premises at public auction for an alleged breach of condition, and conveyed them to some person to the plaintiff unknown, after occupying them a long time for his own use, whereby the plaintiff has been greatly damaged, and has lost his said premises. It is unnecessary to describe the second and third counts, because it is conceded that the second is out of the case in some manner not disclosed by the papers before us, and the demurrer was sustained as to the third count. The demurrer was overruled as to the first count, and the defendant appealed. The case was afterwards tried on the first count.

On the appeal from the order overruling the demurrer as to the first count, the defendant contends that the cause of action there stated is local, and that the count is defective in not alleging good faith on the part of the purchaser of the premises from the defendant. The land mortgaged was in the county of Middlesex, and the action was brought in the county of Suffolk. We think that the gist of the cause of action alleged in the first count is the wrongful execution of the power of sale contained in the mortgage; there having been at that time in fact no breach of the conditions of the mortgage. Under the power of sale contained in the mortgage, it was not necessary for the defendant to enter upon the premises before executing the power, although it is provided in the mortgage that the sale must be on or near the granted premises. The cause of action alleged does not arise from any injury to the real property, but from misconduct in executing a power of sale. We think that the action is transitory. The objection that it is not alleged in the count that the person to whom the defendant conveyed the premises was a purchaser in good faith was not specifically pointed out in the demurrer, and, if such an allegation is material, we think that it is material only on the question of damages. The exceptions recite as follows: "It appeared that on the 16th day of October, 1893, the defendant made an entry on the premises for purposes of foreclosure, and attempted on the same day to execute the power of sale. It was not disputed that at this time there was no breach of the conditions of the mortgage by the mortgagor. It also appeared that, so far as the records showed, the foreclosure was apparently proper in form. It also appeared that the property was purchased at the sale by Hammond Reed, and afterwards conveyed by said Reed to the defendant; that the purchase by said Reed was on behalf of the defendant. It also appeared that on September 3, 1894, the defendant sold and conveyed the property to one Thomas Rice by warranty deed, which deed was recorded September 10, 1894. All of the above-mentioned conveyances were duly recorded, together with the power of sale, foreclosure deed, and affidavit, as required by law."

The defendant requested the following instructions to the jury: "First. This action cannot be maintained, for the reason that the attempt to foreclose a mortgage of real estate when there has been no breach of its terms, is absolutely void, and no damages can result therefrom. Second. No subsequent act of either party can make a foreclosure of a mortgage of real estate, which foreclosure is void at its inception, valid. Third. A recovery in an action on the case, founded upon the attempt to foreclose a real-estate mortgage, when there was no breach of its terms, will not have the effect to make the attempted foreclosure valid, or the title conveyed thereby good." These instructions the court declined to give, except so far as they were embodied in the charge to the jury. In the charge to the jury the court said: "This action is brought by two people who had title and interest in certain real estate owned by one of them, the title to which was in one of them, the other being the husband of that person. A mortgage had been given by the plaintiff to the defendant for $1,200. By the terms of that mortgage, the interest upon the principal sum was to be paid semiannually. The mortgage was given March 2, 1893. It appears that the last payment or advance of the $1,200 to the plaintiff was made by the defendant shortly after August 14, 1893, at which time the total amount advanced under the $1,200 mortgage was $1,128. It is admitted that $36 of the difference between that and $1,200 was detained and retained as interest for the first six months, and that the balance, $36, was retained for the payment of a commission.

It being admitted now that there was no breach of any of the conditions of that mortgage at the time of the pretended sale, the sale operated to convey no title under it. It was an absolute nullity, as if nothing had taken place. If it remains there, and that is all there is to it, then the only damage which the plaintiff has suffered is a nominal damage. But if you are satisfied that, prior to the commencement of this action, the property had been conveyed by the defendant to one Rice, without any knowledge on the part of Rice or notice to Rice of this unlawful act of the defendant, and that Rice bought it for value, then that would operate as conveying a good title to Rice; so that the plaintiff would have no means of getting himself back into possession of that property, it having gone into the possession, by that conveyance, of someone who purchased it for value, in good faith, and without notice of the unlawful act by which the record title of that property came into the defendant. The obligation upon the mortgagee is to deal with the utmost good faith with the mortgagor. If you are satisfied that this defendant knew, or ought to have known, that there was no breach of the condition of that mortgage at the time specified when he foreclosed, or attempted to, [when he] took the foreclosure proceedings, and that subsequently, before this action was brought, title had been conveyed to an innocent purchaser for value without notice, then this action can be maintained for more than nominal charges, if you find more to exist." The jury returned a verdict for $1,108.87.

There seems to be no doubt that such an action can be maintained if, in consequence of the sale, the absolute title to the premises has passed to Rice. Fenton v. Torrey, 138 Mass. 188; Bennett v. Bailey, 150 Mass. 257; Sherwood v. Saxton, 63 Mo. 83. Even if Rice has not acquired an absolute title as against the plaintiff, but should be held, on the facts found in this case, to be only an assignee of the mortgage, still the sale and the subsequent deeds we think have done some injury to the plaintiff. They constitute a cloud upon the title of the plaintiff to an equity of redemption in the premises, which cannot be removed without some expense to the plaintiff, and the damages might be more than nominal. When the sale under the power was made, it was apparent that there might have been a breach of the conditions of the mortgage, because more than six months had expired from the date of the mortgage, and the first payment of interest had become payable. Whether it had been paid or not was a fact which the record in the registry of deeds would not disclose. The exceptions recite that it appeared that the records "showed that the foreclosure was apparently proper in form," which means, we suppose, than within thirty days of the sale a copy of the notice of the sale and the affidavit of the person selling were duly recorded in the registry of deeds, pursuant to Pub. Stat. chap. 181, § 18, and that by the affidavit it appeared that the power of sale had been duly executed. By this section of the statute a duly certified copy of the record thereof "shall be admitted as evidence that the power of sale was duly executed." By the record the title conveyed to Rice appears to be a good, absolute title. The defendant contends that as in fact there was no breach of the conditions of the mortgage when the foreclosure sale was made, it was void, and that the conveyances at most operated only as an assignment of the mortgage, and that the plaintiff has the same right to redeem the land from the mortgage as he ever had, because the copy of the record of the notice of sale and of the affidavit is only evidence that the power of sale was duly executed, but not conclusive evidence.

The difficult question in this case is one of damages. It was a condition precedent to the exercise of the power of sale that there should be "a default in the performance or observance" of the conditions of the mortgage, and, as there was in fact no default, the sale was unauthorized. As between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, the sale would be declared void. So long as the title to the land remained in the defendant, the plaintiff undoubtedly could have redeemed it from the mortgage. But Rice, in effect, has been found by the jury to have been a purchaser for value without notice of any unlawfulness in the sale, and the jury have assessed the damages on the theory that the plaintiff, by the acts of the defendant, has lost all title or interest in the premises.

The law goes a great way in protecting the title of a purchaser for value, without notice or knowledge of any defect in the power of the vendor to sell, and his title is not to be affected by mere irregularities in executing power of sale contained in a mortgage, of which he has no knowledge, actual or constructive. Burns v. Thayer, 115 Mass. 89; Dezler v. Shepard, 117 Mass. 480; Thompson v. Heywood, 129 Mass. 401; Stevenson v. Hand, 148 Mass. 616; Silva v. Turner, 166 Mass. 407, 418. In Montague v. Dawes, 12 Allen, 397, it was held that a tender duly made by the mortgagor, but not followed by a bill to redeem, did not affect the title to a bona fide purchaser claiming title by mesne conveyances from the purchaser at a sale under the power in the mortgage. Still the general rule is that conditions precedent to the execution of a power of sale must be strictly complied with. Smith v. Protin, 4 Allen, 516; Roarty v. Mitchell, 7 Gray, 248; Foster v. Boston, 133 Mass. 143; Dearnaley v. Chass, 136 Mass. 288. See, for cases cited by the plaintiff, Jackson, Bartlett, v. Henry, 10 Johns. 185, 6 Am. Dec. 328; Gibbons v. Hoag, 95 Ill. 45; Warner v. Blakeman, 36 Barb. 501; Hoit v. Russell, 56 N. H. 559; Merchants v. Woods, 27 Minn. 396; Gunnell v. Cockerill, 79 Ill. 79; and for cases cited by the defendant, Shippen v. Whittier, 117 Ill. 282; Pratt v. Tinkcom, 21 Minn. 142; Williams v. Peyton, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 77, 4 L. ed. 518.

On principle, we think it must be considered that in this commonwealth a mortgagee, when there has been no default or breach of the conditions of the mortgage, cannot sell the land mortgaged under the usual power of sale contained in a mortgage, so as to pass a good title even to a bona fide purchaser for value, or to any subsequent purchaser from him. The mortgagor, undoubtedly, by laches, or by acts amounting to an estoppel, may be prevented from contesting the validity of such a title. He may ratify the sale, and the deed given under the power of sale, by parol. McIntyre v. Park, 11 Gray, 102, 71 Am. Dec. 690. The argument certainly is strong that a bona fide purchaser for value ought to be protected in his title by what appears on the record in the registry of deeds, in the absence of knowledge to the contrary; but the argument is, we think, stronger that a mortgagor should not be deprived, without his knowledge, of his equity of redemption, by a sale under a power contained in a mortgage, which authorizes a sale only in case of a default, when there has been no default. A majority of the court, however, do not think that the decision of this case necessarily depends upon the question whether Rice took a good, absolute title or not. The case of the plaintiff, taken most favorably for the defendant, somewhat resembles that of a conversion of personal property, where the owner can sue the wrongdoer, and recover the full value of the property converted, even though the title to the property did not pass by the conversion, or can recover the property; or that of a misappropriation or unauthorized investment or sale of trust property, where the cestus que trust can compel the trustee to account for the full value of the property, even although the property, or some of it, can be recovered. In neither of these cases can the plaintiff recover both the property and full damages for the conversion or misappropriation of it, but if he recover judgment for full damages, and they are paid, the title to the property passes to the wrongdoer and his grantees. A mortgagee, in executing the power of sale contained in a mortgage, is, in a sense, trustee for the mortgagor. So, in the present case, a majority of the court think that the plaintiff, if he so elect, can recover full damages of the defendant, whether he can or cannot redeem the premises from Rice. If the damages recovered are paid, the effect is to make Rice's title good as against the plaintiffs. The defendant, for the purpose of mitigating damages, cannot be heard to say that he has not done what he intended to do, and what, on the face of the transaction, he appears to have done, when what he has done will become valid and effectual if he pays the damages. In the view of a majority of the court, there is no error of law in the exceptions prejudicial to the defendant.

Exceptions overruled.

Justices Allen, Holmes, and Knowlton, are unable to agree with the decision of the court. They had not been aware that the form of recovery for the conversion of chattels had been applied to real estate, or that, if land was wrongfully withdrawn from its owner, there was any remedy at common law except to recover the land. They had supposed, furthermore, that when a deed purporting to execute such a power as this in fact was outside the terms of the power, and was wholly void, it could not be resuscitated at a later moment by a parol ratification on the part of the donor, and more specifically that the doctrine of Miller v. Hyde, 161 Mass. 472, 25 L. R. A. 42, never had been applied to real estate. Furthermore, they doubt whether, if the mortgage sale is ratified, the plaintiff can have any claim except that the price actually received shall be accounted for. But in their opinion these questions are not open. The first count of the declaration insists throughout that the attempted sale was unlawful. It does not in any way purport to accept and ratify it. It expresses an erroneous opinion, it is true, that a subsequent second sale to a third person conveys a good title, whether the plaintiff assents or not, which is not the law. But the gravamen of the count is falsely alleging the conditions to exist which warrant a sale of the plaintiff's property under the mortgage, and unlawfully purporting to sell it, and by these acts slandering the plaintiff's title. Substantial damages properly could be allowed for such slander, but the instruction that, if the property had been sold again to a bona fide purchaser, this would give a good title, inevitably led to a verdict for the value of the property, and this constituted a mistrial.

Alonzo W. PERRY.

(.....Mass.)

The right to use an elevator for hoisting goods from a basement room up to the sidewalk, or lowering them from the sidewalk to the basement, cannot be implied as incidental or appurtenant to the estate in the basement room, where the elevator was not originally intended for use by occupants of that room, and suitable means of ingress and egress were furnished by steps and doors from the basement to the street, while there was at no time any access to the elevator directly from the basement but only through another room by a way which was not a common passageway.

(September 10, 1897.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action to recover damages for alleged breach of a leasing contract by which the lessees were deprived of the use of an elevator which resulted in a judgment in plaintiff's favor. Sustained.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Alfred Hemenway and William A. Knowlton, for defendant:

Deeds are to be construed as meaning what the language employed in them imports, and extrinsic evidence may not be adduced to contradict or effect them.

Buss v. Dyer, 125 Mass. 287.

Whether the right to such use as is claimed, i. e., between the basement room and the street, was created by implication, must depend on whether such use was a necessity. Nothing short of necessity will create such a right or easement when not expressed.

The right to the use of the elevator was one of convenience, not of necessity.

NOTE.—An implied right to use an elevator in connection with leased portions of a building seems to have been brought in question here for the first time.

The right to the use of an elevator may reasonably exist apart from any tenancy.

Where evidence of the right to the use had been introduced, such right has been based on express grant.

Handyside v. Powers, 145 Mass. 128; Kent v. Todd, 144 Mass. 478.

The right granted to the plaintiffs by the first lease was, in express terms, "for the purpose of bringing their finished goods from the two upper chambers of the adjoining estate to said basement." Any other use was thereby excluded.

2 Parsons, Contr. 8th ed. 631; Hammerquist v. Svensson, 44 Ill. App. 627.

But if any right to use the elevator for the purpose of bringing their finished goods to the basement had passed by implication from the prior to the subsequent lease, such right would have ceased when the tenancy of the upper rooms terminated, and the purpose for which it was created ceased.

Innes, Easem. 3d ed. 61; National Guaranteed Marine Co. v. Donald, 4 Hurlst. & N. 8.

If the right to the use of the elevator could have arisen by implication as an easement of necessity in the case of the upper rooms, such right would have ceased when the tenancy of the upper rooms terminated and the necessity from which it took its origin vanished.

Taylor, Land. & T. 8th ed. 174; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 5th ed. 820; Innes, Easem. 3d ed. 61; Pierce v. Selleck, 18 Conn. 821; Alley v. Carleton, 29 Tex. 74, 94 Am. Dec. 260; Blum v. Weston, 103 Cal. 863; Proctor v. Hodgson, 10 Exch. 824.

The use of the elevator in connection with the premises, as set forth in said lease, was merely permissive, and not a right upon which the plaintiffs could insist.

M. Donald v. Lindall, 3 Rawle, 492; McAdam, Land. & T. 2d ed. p. 568, § 236.

If the plaintiffs be entitled to damages by reason of being prevented from using the elevator, by the defendant, then the measure of damages is simply the diminished value of the lease, not damages suffered in their business or loss of profit.

Townsend v. Nickerson Wharf Co. 117 Mass. 501; Dexter v. Manley, 4 Cush. 14; Sedgw. Damages, 27; 1 Sedgw. Damages, 8th ed. *176; Griffin v. Colver, 16 N. Y. 489, 69 Am. Dec. 718; Eisenhart v. Ordean, 3 Colo. App. 162; Martin v. Deets, 103 Cal. 55; Koch v. Merk, 48 Ill. App. 26.

Messrs. R. M. Morse, D. F. Kimball, and Lewis Bass, Jr., for plaintiffs.

Field, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The exceptions do not describe the basement room and the means of access to it from the street with exactness, but from the explanations made at the argument, and the rough plan exhibited, we think we are able to understand the case. As the building was originally constructed, it was plainly not intended that the elevator should be used for hoisting goods from the basement room to the sidewalk of the street, or for lowering goods from the sidewalk to the basement room. The basement room was entered from the street by doors and steps in front of the building, and was lighted by windows from the street, as the height of the basement room extended several feet above the level of the sidewalk. In one corner of the basement had been built a boiler and engine room, with an elevator well, and this room had been separated from the basement room by a solid brick partition. This engine and boiler room was entered from the sidewalk by a door and steps, and the elevator well was in the corner of this room next to the sidewalk. There was also a door opening from the sidewalk by which goods could be placed on the elevator. By neither of these doors was there originally any communication with the basement room. The original construction of the building indicated that all goods must be carried into the basement room from the street, and be carried from the basement room to the street by means of the flight of steps and the doors in the front of the building on the street, and that the elevator was to be used for the stores above the basement, in connection with the sidewalk, where a door to the elevator was placed. Cummings & Thrope first entered into occupation of the basement room on January 1, 1884, under a lease from J. Franklin Faxon, Elms, and others for four years from January 1, 1884. This lease was dated April 8, 1883, and by it the lessors "do hereby lease unto the said Cummings & Thrope the basement room of the building known as Church Green, situated on the corner of Summer and Bedford streets, in the city of Boston, now occupied by the Shoe & Leather Association, and [sic] to make the necessary connection in said room with the freight elevator now in said building, and to furnish, free of charge, the use of the same to the said lessees, for the purpose of bringing their finished goods from the two upper chambers of the adjoining estate, which they are expecting to occupy for manufacturing purposes, to said basement, through the connection which is already made between said elevator and said chambers, making no new openings or connections." There follows a provision that the lessees, before they take possession, shall deposit with the lessors bonds or other securities satisfactory to the lessors, to the amount of $2,000, as security for the payment of the rent, etc., and then occurs the following clause: "The opening from said premises to the said elevator to be made as soon as said Cummings & Thrope shall comply with the above conditions, and occupy said premises." The exceptions recite that "a door was cut, at the time of commencement of this lease, through said brick partition, from said basement into the engine room, so that access might be had from said basement to said elevator by going through said door-way in said brick partition, then through and across the engine room to the further corner thereof, where the elevator was situated," etc. The exceptions continually refer to the lessees under this lease as the plaintiffs in the action, but the lessees under this lease are Josiah Cummings and 88 L. R. A.

Walter Thrope, who sign the lease individually and as Cummings & Thrope, while the plaintiffs are Josiah Cummings and E. J. Cummings, co-partners under the name of Josiah Cummings & Co., who are the lessees in the lease from the Boston Real Estate Trust, hereinafter mentioned. We infer that one firm was the successor to the other, and that the change in the firm was made some time during the continuance of the first lease. For convenience we shall follow the language of the exceptions, and shall consider the plaintiffs as occupying under both the first and second leases, which is perhaps as favorable a view to the plaintiffs as can be taken. On December 23, 1887, the plaintiffs, Josiah Cummings and Edward J. Cummings, copartners, as aforesaid, as lessees executed a lease with the trustees of the Boston Real Estate Trust, to whom Faxon and others had conveyed the whole estate in September or October, 1886. By this lease there was demised and let to said lessees "the basement room of the building known as 'Church Green,' at the corner of Summer and Bedford streets in said Boston; also, with one-horse power only, rooms No. 29 and 30 in said building. The lessors reserve the right to terminate this lease as to said rooms 29 and 30 on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1890, by giving the lessees sixty days' notice in writing. In case of such termination, the rent from and after January 1, 1890, shall be for the remainder of the premises $4,250 yearly. The lessors also reserve the right to enlarge the boiler room in the rear, in which case they shall first give the lessees sixty days' notice in writing." The Boston Real Estate Trust assigned this lease to the defendant on March 1, 1888, and thereafter, the defendant collected the rents, and stood in the place of the lessors.

The exceptions recite as follows: "From January 1, 1884, to December 31, 1887, these plaintiffs occupied upper chambers of an adjoining estate, called the 'Sprague Estate,' for the purpose of manufacturing their goods. A passageway was cut through the partition wall into the Church Green building, to enable the plaintiffs to load their merchandise from these upper rooms on to the elevator, so they might have it lowered to the engine room, thence across the engine room to the basement named in the lease. From January 1, 1888, to January 1, 1890, in addition to a portion of the said upper chambers the plaintiffs occupied rooms 29 and 30, which were in upper part of Church Green building, on a floor adjoining said upper chambers, in said adjoining estate. These were also used for manufacturing goods, which were transferred to the basement, by means of said elevator, for sale. The plaintiffs testified that during the continuance of the lease expiring December 31, 1887 (Exhibit B), and also during the continuance of the lease commencing January 1, 1888 (Exhibit A), up to January 1, 1890, the plaintiff used said elevator for the purpose of shipping from the basement all goods they handled. There was no evidence that this defendant or any prior lessors knew of, or assented to, this latter use of the elevator, unless it be contained in the following testimony,—that of E. J. Cummings, plaintiff, who testified that under the old lease the use of the elevator in connection with the basement was continuous, and that it was used by the tenants throughout the building generally, and that the owners, the trust company, told the plaintiffs that the elevator was for the use of the tenant. J. Cummings testified that the elevator was used with the basement, and the arch cut out for such use by the lessor Elms, and so continued to be used until December 24, 1889."

It is conceded on both sides that the words "with one-horse power only," found in the last lease, relate to the elevator, and were intended to define the amount of power which the lessors agreed with the lessees to furnish in running the elevator. It is manifest that this agreement is connected with the letting of rooms numbered 29 and 30 in the building. In neither of the leases is there any express agreement for the use of the elevator in lowering goods from the sidewalk to the basement room, or in hoisting them from the basement room to the sidewalk. We infer that at some time, probably after the termination of the tenancy of the rooms 29 and 30 on January 1, 1890, the defendant prevented the plaintiffs from using the elevator to lower goods from, or to hoist them to, the sidewalk, or from using the elevator in any manner. This is the principal cause of action declared on, and the exceptions imply that there was some evidence of it; and, although this is not so distinctly stated as it should have been, we understand that it is conceded.

The principal question in the case is whether the plaintiffs had any right to use the elevator for hoisting goods from the basement room up to the sidewalk, or for lowering them from the sidewalk to the basement room, as incidental or appurtenant to their estate in the basement room under the last lease. The claim of the plaintiffs is stated in the charge of the presiding justice as follows: "In the first place, with reference to the right of the plaintiffs to make this use of the elevator and the approach to it from the basement, in connection with the business of the basement,—that is to take goods from the sidewalk into the basement, and from the basement out onto the sidewalk,—this right is not given by any express words in the lease. The lease is silent with reference to that. It merely leases the rooms,—the basement and the two rooms above,—so that the plaintiffs do not claim to have acquired this right to this approach and to the elevator by any express words in the lease; but they claim that it is given in the lease by virtue of the situation of the premises, and the use that had been and was made of them. The construction of the premises, and the design as to the use of the elevator in connection with the basement by the owner of the building. That, by reason of the circumstances, the situation and adaptation of the building, and the use that is made of it, this right to use the elevator passed to them as an incident to the use of the basement for their purposes, or, to use a technical word, as an appurtenance,—that is, something incidental to, and connected with, the principal thing, which was the use of the basement,—one of the conveniences for enjoyment of the basement which he had hired." The presiding justice instructed the jury, among other things, as follows: "Now, having considered the facts with reference to these different matters that I have called your attention to, I will instruct you that if the elevator and approach thereto were constructed and designed by the owner of said building to be used in connection with said basement and the other parts of said building for the purposes claimed by the plaintiffs, and the elevator and approach were used by the plaintiffs for the purposes claimed by them, in connection with the basement, in carrying on business therein, with the knowledge of the lessors, at the time of their lease to the plaintiffs, commencing January 1, 1888, and if from the date of said lease to the time of its assignment to the defendant the elevator and approach were used by the plaintiffs for the purposes now claimed by the plaintiffs in carrying on their business in said basement, with the knowledge and consent of said lessors, as a privilege belonging to the plaintiffs as the lessees of the basement, then the defendant would not have the right, upon becoming the assignee of the lease, to prevent the use and enjoyment of that privilege, the use of the approach, and the use of the elevator; and, if he did prevent the use of it by the plaintiffs, he would be liable to pay any damage which they sustained by reason of that prevention."

This court has held the doctrine of implied grants with a good deal of strictness. Buss v. Dyer, 125 Mass. 287; Randall v. McLaughlin, 10 Allen, 388; Lowell v. Strahan, 145 Mass. 1; Johnson v. Knapp, 150 Mass. 267; Case v. Minot, 158 Mass. 577, 23 L. R. A. 536. It is true that when a person hires a room in a building, a right to use the apparent means of access and exit often passes as appurtenant to the premises hired. In modern buildings of great height this doctrine we assume may be applied to elevators. Whether an active duty to maintain an elevator for the use of tenants can be implied may be open to question, but, if an elevator is in fact maintained by the landlord, the duty to permit tenants to use it, we assume, may be implied, if this is reasonably necessary for the beneficial occupation of the rooms let, and if, from the construction of the elevator and of the passageways, it is apparent that the elevator was intended for the use of the tenants. But in the present case it is apparent that the elevator was not intended originally to be used by the occupants of the basement room; that, although it might have been convenient for them to use it in connection with the sidewalk, yet suitable means of ingress and egress were furnished by means of the steps and doors from the basement room into the street; that at no time was there any access to the elevator directly from the basement room; that the elevator did not adjoin the basement room, and the way through the engine and boiler room to the elevator from the basement room was not a common passageway; but that, for the purpose of connecting the basement room with certain rooms in the upper part of the building, or of the adjoining building, access to the elevator from the basement room by a way through the engine and boiler room had been provided; that this was originally done "for the purpose of bringing their finished goods from the two upper chambers of the adjoining estate, which they are expecting to occupy for manufacturing purposes, to said basement;" and that the only reference to the elevator contained in the last lease is in connection with the tenancy of the rooms 29 and 30 in the building. Under these circumstances, a majority of the court think that an implied grant of a right to use the elevator for the purpose of hoisting goods from the basement room to the sidewalk, and of lowering them from the sidewalk to the basement room cannot be implied. The fact, if it be one, that the defendant or his predecessors in title permitted the plaintiffs to make such a use of the elevator, under the circumstances stated, cannot establish the right. The express agreements concerning the elevator contained in the leases tend to negative the right to such a use of it, and the history of the opening into the engine room and the use of a way across it to the elevator repel any implication of the right to use the elevator for all purposes for which it might be convenient to use it in connection with the basement room. In the opinion of a majority of the court, upon all the evidence recited in the exceptions, which purports to be all the evidence material to this issue, the presiding justice should have ruled, as requested by the defendant, that the plaintiffs showed no right to use the elevator after its tenancy of rooms 29 and 30 had been terminated, and no right to use it at any time for the purpose of hoisting goods to the sidewalk from the basement room, or of lowering them from the sidewalk to the basement room.

Exceptions sustained.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

(90 Me. 153.)

1. An insurance company is not denied the equal protection of the laws by a statute which in effect limits the liability of a railroad company for fires to the difference between the amount of loss and the amount of insurance on the property destroyed, thus depriving the insurer of the benefit of subrogation.
2. A statute limiting the liability of a railroad company for fires to the difference between the amount of the loss and the amount of insurance upon the property applies to a pre-existing policy of insurance on which a loss occurs after the passage of the statute.
3. The obligation of a contract of fire insurance made at a time when a railroad company was by statute liable for fires communicated by its engines is not impaired by a subsequent amendment of the statute restricting the liability of the railroad company in effect to the difference between the loss and the amount of insurance on the property, as the parties to that contract cannot limit the right of the legislature to change the statutory liability.
4. The right of recovery against the person causing the loss which is reserved to the insurer by a clause in the policy depends upon the law existing at the time of the fire.

(April 9, 1897.)

SUBMISSION on agreed statement of an action brought to recover damages for injuries caused by fire alleged to have been negligently set out by defendant in which defendant claimed the benefit of insurance which had been taken out by plaintiff upon her property. Judgment giving defendant the benefit of the insurance.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles F. Stetson for plaintiff.

Mr. Charles F. Woodard for defendant.

Wiswell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On July 26, 1895, the plaintiff's property, both real and personal, was injured by fire communicated by a locomotive engine in use by the defendant corporation, but, as is admitted, without fault or negligence on the part of the defendant. The plaintiff had insurance upon her property against fire under policies dated in March, 1895.

Rev. Stat. chap. 51, § 64, prior to the amendment of 1895, was as follows: "When a building or other property is injured by fire communicated by a locomotive engine, the corporation using it is responsible for such injury, and it has an insurable interest in the property along the route, for which it is responsible, and may procure insurance thereon." Under this statute it was well settled that, in accordance with the doctrine of subrogation, an insurance company which had paid a loss upon property injured by fire communicated by a locomotive engine could maintain an action in the name of the assured against the railroad corporation using the locomotive, and recover the amount which it had been obliged to pay by reason of the contract of insurance.

But the legislature of 1895 amended this statute by adding thereto the following provision: "But such corporation shall be entitled to the benefit of any insurance upon such property effected by the owner thereof less the premium and expense of recovery. The insurance shall be deducted from the damages, note to the latter case are reviewed the authorities on the constitutionality of statutes making railroads absolutely liable for damages.

if recovered before the damages are assessed, or, if not, the policy shall be assigned to such corporation, which may maintain an action thereon, or prosecute, at its own expense, any action already commenced by the insured, in either case with all the rights which the insured originally had." Laws 1895, chap. 79.

In this case the insurance had been recovered prior to the assessment of damages by a referee; the question as to whether the amount of insurance received by the plaintiff should be deducted from the damages being expressly reserved in the reference, and presented to this court upon an agreed statement of facts. The action is prosecuted for the benefit of the insurance companies, who had paid a portion of the loss, as well as for the plaintiff.

There can be no question as to the meaning of the amendment. It is expressly provided that the corporation liable for the injury by reason of fire communicated from its locomotive engine "shall be entitled to the benefit of any insurance upon such property effected by the owner thereof," and that the insurance "shall be deducted from the damages, if recovered before the damages are assessed." The effect of the statute as it now stands is to make railroad companies liable in such cases for the difference only between the net amount of insurance recovered and the amount of the injury suffered by the property owner. Before the amendment, by reason of the statute. Liability, the railroad company was responsible to the owner of the property thus injured, notwithstanding that the property was fully insured, and notwithstanding that the owner had received full indemnity from the insurance company. But in the latter case, upon the equitable principles of the doctrine of subrogation, this responsibility of the railroad company to the owner insured to the benefit of the insurer. Since the amendment, the liability is limited to the difference, as we have already seen.

But it is contended upon the part of the counsel for the plaintiff, representing the interests of the insurers, that this amendment of 1895 is invalid, because in violation of the last clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution: "Nor shall any state . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

This clause has very frequently been before the Federal Supreme Court in attempts by unsuccessful litigants in the state courts to have legislative acts of almost every kind and unfavorable decisions of the state courts held to be within the inhibition of this clause, and it has received so frequent judicial construction by that court that its meaning has become pretty well settled.

In Barbier v. Connolly, 118 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923, Mr. Justice Field, in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "The 14th Amendment, in declaring that no state 'shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws,' undoubtedly intended, not only that there should be no arbitrary deprivation of life or liberty or arbitrary spoliation of property but that equal protection and security should be given to all under like circumstances in the enjoyment of their personal and civil rights; that all persons should be equally entitled to pursue their happiness and acquire and enjoy property; that they should have like access to the courts of the country for the protection of their persons and property, the prevention and redress of wrongs, and the enforcement of contracts; that no impediment should be interposed to the pursuits of anyone except as applied to the same pursuits by others under like circumstances; that no greater burdens should be laid upon one than are laid upon others in the same calling and condition.

. . . Class legislation, discriminating against some and favoring others, is prohibited; but legislation which, in carrying out a public purpose, is limited in its application, if within the sphere of its operation it affects alike all persons similarly situated, is not within the amendment."

Legislation which is special in its character is not obnoxious to the last clause of the Fourteenth Amendment if all persons subject to it are treated alike, under similar circumstances and conditions, in respect both of the privileges conferred and the liabilities imposed. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 305, 32 L. ed. 107.

Whenever the law operates alike upon all persons and property similarly situated, equal protection cannot be said to be denied. Walston v. Nevin, 128 U. S. 578, 32 L. ed. 544.

"It merely requires that all persons subjected to such legislation shall be treated alike, under like circumstances and conditions, both in the privileges conferred and in the liabilities imposed." Marohant v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 158 U. S. 380, 38 L. ed. 751.

"There is no evasion of the rule of equality where all companies are subjected to the same duties and liabilities under similar circumstances. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U. S. 512, 29 L. ed. 463.

In view of the construction which has so frequently been placed upon this clause by the United States Supreme Court, is the act of 1895 within the inhibition of the clause? We think not. The law operates alike upon all persons and property similarly situated. The act is general in its terms, and applies to all cases falling within its provisions. All persons and property subject to it are treated alike. The liability of the railroad corporation is the same, whatever the property injured, or by whomsoever it may be owned. There is no unjust discrimination in the protection given by the statute between different persons or classes of persons.

It is argued, however, by the counsel for the plaintiff, that an insurer has a vested interest in the property insured; "to a certain extent an ownership;" and that, while the statute as amended furnishes full and absolute protection to the actual owner, it affords none whatever to the insurer; that, therefore, there is an unjust discrimination against a class of persons, viz., insurance companies,—corporations being undoubtedly persons, within the meaning of the constitutional amendment.

But we think that the right which an insurer who has paid the loss has to prosecute for his own benefit any person primarily liable to the assured for the injury is not based at all upon the idea that he has a vested interest, or any ownership whatever, in the property insured, but rather upon the doctrine of subrogation, which is founded, not upon contract, but upon the relationship of the parties, and upon equitable principles for the purpose of accomplishing the substantial ends of justice.

In accordance with these equitable principles, a surety who has been compelled to pay a debt for which another is primarily liable, succeeds to all the rights which the creditor had of enforcing the liability of the original debtor; or an insurer who has paid a loss for which another is responsible, either by statute or at common law, is subrogated to any claim that the insured had against the person whose tortious act caused the injury, or who, for any other reason, is liable to the owner thereof. If this were not so, the very inequitable result would follow that an insured owner of property, for an injury for which another is liable, would recover for one and the same loss full indemnity from the insurer, and compensation from the person liable therefor.

"Subrogation is the substitution of one person in place of another, whether as a creditor or as the possessor of any other rightful claim, so that he who is substituted succeeds to the rights of the other in relation to the debt or claim, and its rights, remedies, or securities." Jackson Co. v. Boylston Mut. Ins. Co. 139 Mass. 508, 52 Am. Rep. 728.

It necessarily follows from the very principles of this doctrine of subrogation that one cannot thereby succeed to or acquire any claim or right which the party for whom he is substituted did not have. A mere statement of this proposition is such that the citation of authority in support of it is not necessary, but ample authority is not wanting.

"The party subrogated acquires no greater rights than those of the party for whom he is substituted." Jackson Co. v. Boylston Mut. Ins. Co. 139 Mass. 508, 52 Am. Rep. 728.

"In any form of remedy, the insurer can take nothing by subrogation but the rights of the assured." Phenix Ins. Co. v. Erie & W. Transp. Co. 117 U. S. 312, 29 L. ed. 873.

The right of the insurance company "is a mere equity to be put in the place of the insurer, . . . whatever his rights may be." Kernochan v. New York Bowery F. Ins. Co. 17 N. Y. 428.

The following cases are excellent illustrations of the doctrine of subrogation and of the proposition that the insurer by subrogation succeeds to such claims and rights as the person indemnified had, and to none other.

In the case of Simpson v. Thomson, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 279, decided by the House of Lords in 1877, an insured steamship was run down and destroyed by another steamship. Both vessels belonged to the same owner. The underwriters paid as for a total loss upon the steamship destroyed, and sought to share with the owners of the cargo in a fund which the vessel owner had paid into court under an act limiting the liability of the shipowners. The law peers who delivered opinions all agreed that the question must be considered just as if the underwriters had brought an action against the owner of both vessels; and the House of Lords decided that, although the underwriters had paid for a total loss, and were entitled to all the rights in the injured ship which belonged to its owner, yet, if that owner could not assert a claim for damages against the wrongdoers, neither could the underwriters; that the underwriters' claim must be asserted in the name of the insured; and that any right of action that he had must be a right of action against himself, which is an absurdity, and thing unknown to law. The lord chancellor in delivering his opinion said: "I know of no foundation for the right of underwriters, except the well-known principle of law, that where one person has agreed to indemnify another, he will, on making good the indemnity, be entitled to succeed to all the ways and means by which the person indemnified might have protected himself against or reimbursed himself for the loss. It is on this principle that the underwriters of a ship that has been lost are entitled to the ship in specie if they can find and recover it; and it is on the same principle that they can assert any right which the owner of the ship might have asserted against a wrongdoer for damage for the act which has caused the loss. But this right of action for damages they must assert, not in their own name, but in the name of the person insured; and if the person insured be the person who has caused the damage, I am unable to see how the right can be asserted at all."

In Jackson Co. v. Boylston Mut. Ins. Co. 139 Mass. 508, 52 Am. Rep. 728, the defendant insured the plaintiff on cotton in transit between different places in the United States and the plaintiff's mills in New Hampshire. The contract for transportation with a carrier contained a stipulation that "the company [carrier] incurring such liability shall have the benefit of any insurance which may have been effected upon or on account of said cotton." It was held that it was no defense to an action on the policy for a loss insured against that the insured had, by contract with the carrier, given him the benefit of any insurance effected, if there was no fraud or concealment on the part of the insured in effecting the insurance, and if the policy of insurance contained no clause specifically subrogating the insurer to the rights of the insured in case of a loss through the fault of a carrier.

In Phenix Ins. Co. v. Erie & W. Transp. Co. 117 U. S. 312, 29 L. ed. 873, goods in transit were insured by the plaintiff. A stipulation in the bill of lading allowed the carrier the benefit of any insurance procured by the owner. It was held that this stipulation was valid, although the loss was occasioned by the negligence of the carrier or his agents; and that, in the absence of fraudulent concealment or misrepresentation, the insurer could maintain no action against the carrier upon any terms inconsistent with the stipulation. Mr. Justice Gray, in delivering the judgment of the court, used language that has a special significance with reference to the plaintiff's contention in this case. "That the right of the assured to recover damages against a third person is not incident to the property in the thing insured, but only a personal right of the assured, is clearly shown by the fact that the insurer acquires a beneficial interest in that right of action, in proportion to the sum paid by him, not only in the case of a total loss, but likewise in the case of a partial loss, and when no interest in the property is abandoned or accrues to him."

These cases and many others which might be cited, many of which are collected in the last two cases referred to, clearly illustrate the principles of the doctrine of subrogation, and show that the rights of an insurer in no sense depend upon any vested interest or ownership in the property insured, but entirely upon the equitable rule that one who has indemnified a property owner against loss should, in case of loss and payment, either in full or in part, be allowed to succeed to whatever rights the owner had to the extent of such payment against the person primarily liable therefor.

This clause in the insurance policies: "If this company shall claim that the fire was caused by the act or neglect of any person or corporation, private or municipal, this company shall, on payment of the loss, be subrogated to the extent of such payment to all right of recovery by the insured for the loss resulting therefrom,"—gives the insurers no greater right, in a case of this kind, than they would have had without it. Its only effect was to prevent the assured from releasing any claim that she had against anyone responsible for the injury.

It is further urged that the act of 1895 cannot affect the plaintiff's right of recovery in this case, because otherwise it would impair the obligation of a contract; that it is not, and was not intended to be, retrospective. The plaintiff's property was injured by fire on July 26, 1895, some months after the act of 1895 became effective by the expiration of thirty days after the recess of the legislature passing it. The insurance policies were dated in March, some time before the act went into effect.

It is certainly true that the act was not intended to be and is not retrospective. The limitation of liability does not apply to any case where fire was communicated by a locomotive prior to the time that the law went into effect. But was it not intended, and does it not apply, to any injury thus caused afterwards? We think that such was the intention, and that the act does apply to this case. Nor can we see how it in any way affects or impairs the obligation of a contract. It undoubtedly very materially affects the rights of the insurer, but not his contractual rights. This was entirely within the province and power of the legislature. The liability of the railroad corporation was created by the legislature. It was not based upon negligence, but was placed rather as a condition upon its franchise. We have no doubt that the same power which created this unconditional liability could either limit or entirely take it away.

In Buell v. Daggs, 108 U. S. 143, 27 L. ed. 682, in which it was decided that a statute which repealed usury laws and destroyed defenses to existing contracts on the ground of usury did not deprive parties of vested rights, nor impair the obligation of contracts, Mr. Justice Matthews, in the opinion, says "that the right of a defendant to avoid his contract is given to him by statute, for purposes of its own, and not because it affects the merits of his obligation; and that, whatever the statute gives, under such circumstances, as long as it remains in fieri, and not realized, by having passed into a completed transaction, may by a subsequent statute be taken away."

It would hardly be claimed for a moment that a property owner along the route of a railroad has a vested right in this statutory liability, however much he might be injured by its repeal; nor do we think that an insurer has any more reason to complain of the unconstitutionality of the law. Certainly, the state cannot be said to have assumed any obligation, by the enactment of the original statute, to continue this liability of a railroad corporation without change beyond its pleasure.

It is said, however, that the clause in the policies already quoted gives to the insurer the right to be subrogated to this claim against a railroad corporation as it existed at the time that the contract of insurance was made. If this were the object of the clause, we are unable to see how two persons can, by contract, continue the statutory liability of a third person, not a party to the contract, beyond such a time as the legislature may see fit, by enactment subsequent to the contract, to limit or repeal the liability. While the legislature cannot impair the obligation of the contract between the insurer and the insured, the parties to the contract cannot prolong the statutory liability of a third and independent person, when the legislature has seen fit to limit or repeal it.

But the clause relied upon does not go to the extent claimed by the counsel. It simply provides that if the insurance company shall claim that the fire was caused by the act or neglect of any other person the company "shall on payment of the loss, be subrogated to the extent of such payment to all right of recovery by the insured for the loss resulting therefrom." This cannot refer to any right of recovery by the insured before the loss. It is a right of recovery "by the insured for the loss,"—necessarily such right as the insured had at the time of the loss and afterwards. This amendment in no way affected that provision in the policy. The insurance company after as well as before the time when this law went into effect had the right to be subrogated to all the right of recovery that the insured had, and this independently of the contract, as we have already seen.

What this right of recovery was that the insured had for a fire communicated from one of the defendant's locomotives, but without fault or negligence upon the part of the defendant, depended upon the law as it was at the time of the fire. We have already seen that this right did not depend upon any interest or ownership of the insurer in the property insured, but rested entirely upon the equitable rule that one who, by reason of a contract, has been obliged to indemnify another against loss, should succeed to all the rights that other had, to the extent of the amount paid, to recover of the person who, for any reason, was primarily liable therefor, but to no other nor greater rights than he had.

In this connection we again quote from the opinion of Mr. Justice Gray in Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Erie & W. Transp. Co. 117 U. S. 812, 29 L. ed. 873: "But the insurer stands in no relation of contract or of privity with such persons. His title arises out of the contract of insurance, and is derived from the assured alone, and can only be enforced in the right of the latter." This right of subrogation remained in the insurer precisely the same after the act of 1895 went into effect as before. But in the meantime between the making of the contract of insurance and the time of the fire the plaintiff's right had been limited to a recovery of the difference between the amount of the injury and the amount of the insurance received, thus indirectly affecting the insurer's rights, but not its contractual rights.

Our conclusion is that the act of 1895 is not in violation of any provision of the Federal Constitution, and that it does apply to this case. From the amount of damages assessed by the referee there will, therefore, be deducted the insurance received by the plaintiff, less the premium paid, and the expense, if any, of the recovery of insurance. The plaintiff will be entitled to judgment for this difference, together with interest thereon as provided by law.

BURKE COUNTY FAIR ASSOCIATION
et al.

(119 N. C. 525.)

1. The owners of a horse not known to be vicious or dangerous are not liable to a bystander injured by his bolting the track during a race in which he was entered while he was in charge of a good and expert rider.
2. A fair association is not liable for injuries to one who is injured by the bolting of a horse from a track where a race is being held if it has provided a suitable grand stand from which the race could be viewed and has erected a railing composed of 2x4 timber nailed to posts 3/4 or 4 feet high, between the race course and the place where spectators will be located.
3. Contributory negligence will prevent a recovery by a spectator of a race, who is injured by a horse bolting the track, if he remained at a point from which the marshal commanded him to stand back because the place was dangerous.

(December 8, 1896.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for McDowell County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. J. Justice for appellant.

Messrs. S. J. Ervin, Edmund Jones, Avery & Ervin, and W. C. Newland for appellees.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, in his complaint, alleged that Hinkle, Craig, & Co. and T. L. Craig, at the fair held by defendant the Burke County Fair Association, at Morganton, in October, 1891, were permitted and allowed by the fair association to enter and run a horse, which they knew to be wild and dangerous and untrained, in a race upon the course of the defendant association; that the defendant association, knowing when they permitted the other defendants to enter and run the horse that he was wild and dangerous and untrained, had failed and neglected to have the race course inclosed by a proper fence or guard so as to provide against accidents to persons who were witnesses of the race; and that by reason of such negligence the horse bolted the track, knocked down the railing, and ran over and injured the plaintiff, who was a spectator (having paid his entrance fee), standing where visitors to the fair usually stood when witnessing the racing. The defendants, while admitting the serious injury of the plaintiff by the horse, which they admitted belonged to Wilson & Craig, denied the other material allegations of the complaint, and averred that the plaintiff, by his being drunk, and standing where he ought not to have been, contributed to and caused his own injury. When the evidence was concluded, the court intimated that the testimony did not show negligence on the part of any of the defendants, and that in no view was the plaintiff entitled to recover. There was judgment of nonsuit and the plaintiff appealed.

There was no error in the conclusion of the court. We find no evidence tending to show that the horse was wild or dangerous, but, on the contrary, the witness Hinkle testified that he was gentle, and, although it appeared that he had never entered a race before that, yet he had never been known to jump the track or swerve before. There was no evidence that either of the defendants, at the time the horse was entered, or at the time of permitting him to be entered or run, had any knowledge that he was wild, dangerous, or untrained. Before the owner of a domestic animal can be charged for injuries inflicted by it, it must be shown that the owner had knowledge of the fact that the animal was vicious and unruly. Harris v. Fisher, 115 N. C. 322. In addition, the owner of the horse had him ridden by an excellent horseman. The plaintiff's witness Atkins testified that the rider Haney was "a good rider; no better in the state." We cannot see how it can be reasonably intended that the owner of a gentle horse or of a horse not known to be vicious or dangerous or unruly who enters him for a race, in charge of a good and expert rider, can be responsible in damages for an injury to a spectator, caused solely by the unforeseen unruliness of the horse, more especially where safe and suitable places are provided from which the race might have been seen. Such an injury must be regarded as an accident.

There is no testimony going to show negligence on the part of the defendant association. It seems that a building called the "Grand Stand," from which the race could be viewed, had been erected on the grounds. The race course, where necessary, was inclosed on both sides by a good pine railing 2 by 4 inches, nailed to posts planted in the ground, and 8½ or 4 feet high. We think that these precautions taken and provisions made for the safety and comfort of its visitors by the association were reasonably safe and suitable. And that is the degree of care which the law requires of them. Hart v. Washington Park Club, 157 Ill. 9, 29 L. R. A. 493.

It may be unnecessary to the decision of this case to consider the matter of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, but it may be proper to observe that, if the defendants could possibly be considered negligent under any view of the case, the plaintiff could not recover, because it plainly appears by the undisputed testimony that he caused and contributed to his own injury. The plaintiff's witness Campbell, who was policeman and marshal, testified that he announced to the crowd standing where the plaintiff was that the race was coming off, and to get back from that point; to get off the rail. He told them it was dangerous there, and that they might be hurt; and the plaintiff himself testified that he heard the marshal halloo out, "Stand back!" But he did not change his position. Upon a review of the whole testimony, we are of opinion that his honor was correct in holding that the plaintiff could not recover.

No error.

Avery and Furches, JJ., did not sit on the hearing of this case.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Samuel MITCHELL et al., Appts.,

City of NEGAUNEE et al.

(.....Mich.....)

1. The installation of an electric-light plant may be provided for at special election under Laws 1891, act No. 186, and the provisions of the charter of the city of Negaunee.
2. Municipalities may be authorized to own electric-lighting plants which shall furnish lights, not only to the municipality, but also to its citizens.

(June 7, 1897.)

APPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Marquette County dismissing a bill to restrain the carrying out of certain contracts for the erection of an electric-light plant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hayden & Young, for appellants:

The action of a municipal corporation may be impeached for fraud at the instance of persons injured thereby.

Dill. Mun. Corp. p. 390, §§ 811, 812; State, Atty. Gen., v. Cincinnati Gaslight & C. Co. 18 Ohio St. 263; Baird v. New York, 96 N. Y. 567; People v. Stephens, 71 N. Y. 527; Morgan v. Binghamton, 102 N. Y. 500.

In case of a misappropriation of public funds the right of taxpayers who are injured thereby to unite in a suit asking for relief by injunction has been repeatedly affirmed in this state.

Scovell v. Lansing, 17 Mich. 437; Cartenius v. Hoyt, 87 Mich. 583; Putnam v. Grand Rapids, 58 Mich. 416; Alpena v. Kelley, 97 Mich. 550.

There is no authority either in the charter of the city of Negaunee or in the general law for submitting the question of erecting an electric-light plant to the electors at a special election.

NOTE.—As to municipal ownership of electric-light plant, see also Citizens' Gaslight Co. v. Wakefield (Mass.) 31 L. R. A. 457; Jacksonville Electric

City charters are to be strictly construed, and such municipalities possess no powers but those conferred by the acts creating them.

The power to call a special election for the purpose in question is not given by the charter and therefore does not exist. There is no inherent reserved power in the people to hold elections. They are therefore of no effect unless held by virtue of some law in force when the election is held.

It was never meant that the power to tax should be exercised to the detriment of the citizen. It is limited and can only be imposed for a public, and not a mere private, purpose.

The cost of making all improvements may be paid out of the general fund, or may be assessed upon abutting property or other property specially benefited. It is a question of legislative expediency, with which the courts will not interfere.

Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 739, 740-742; Sheley v. Detroit, 45 Mich. 432.

Messrs. Clark & Pearl, with Mr. F. A. Bell, for the City.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The city of Negaunee has a population of about 6,000 people. In 1896 it made a contract with Arbuckle, Ryan, & Co., for a steam plant complete, for $3,474. At the same time it made a contract with the Ft. Wayne Electric Corporation for an electric plant complete, at a cost of $6,500. This proceeding is brought by the complainants, who are large taxpayers, to restrain the carrying out of these contracts. The circuit judge, after hearing the proofs in open court, dismissed the bill. Complainants appeal, assigning as grounds of their appeal: (1) The contracts were vitiated by the fraudulent conduct of the council, engineer, and the two contractors. (2) There was no money on hand in the treasury which could lawfully be applied to the purpose of installing an electric plant. (3) The electors could not authorize the installing of an electric plant at a special election. (4) That the city of Negaunee has no power, and the legislature cannot confer upon it power, to tax lands which can receive no benefit, for the installation of an electric-light plant to do municipal lighting, and to engage in the supplying of lights to private parties.

Taking these propositions up in the order in which they are presented, a careful examination of the record does not, in our judgment, establish any such fraud in relation to this contract, or in the proceedings leading up to it, as would warrant a court in restraining the execution of it for that reason. As to the proposition that there is no money on hand that can be applied to this contract. There is no suggestion that there is any requirement in the charter, nor has any provision of law been called to our attention, requiring that the money shall be in the treasury before a contract of this kind can be entered upon. It is not necessary to discuss the claim that a sufficient amount of money arising from the liquor tax is now on hand, or will be in the treasury in time to meet the terms of the contract. This brings us to the next question. Can the electors authorize the installation of this plant at a special election? A special election was called, at which a large majority of the electors voted in favor of establishing the plant. If the question was one that could be submitted at a special election, it was properly submitted, carried, and canvassed. The circuit judge found that act No. 186 of the Session Laws of 1891, as amended, and the provisions of the charter, authorize the electors to provide for the installation of such a plant at a special election, when ordered in the manner in which the special election was held. We think he was right in his conclusion. George v. Wyandotte Electric Light Co. 105 Mich. 1.

We now come to the important question in the case. Negaunee has been incorporated as a city a good many years. Lands of the complainant, which were unplatted vacant wild lands, were inside the corporation prior to 1891. In that year the area of the city was greatly extended by the provisions of an amended charter. At this time a still larger quantity of complainants' lands was included in the corporate limits. So far as the record discloses, no complaint has been made of this action until the filing of this bill. It is now claimed that the lands owned by the complainants which are not city lots, some of which are not improved, most of which are so remote as not to be benefited by electric lights, cannot be taxed to install a plant which is to be used, not only to light the streets and alleys of the city, but also to furnish lights to private parties. It is urged that the right of taxation was never meant to be used to the detriment of the citizen, but for his benefit; that taxes can be imposed only for a public, and not a private, purpose. It is the contention that the taxing-district in which the tax may be levied should be limited to the locality which is to be benefited by the expenditure of the tax, and that, as these lands will not be benefited by the installation of this plant, it is not right to tax the owners of them. Complainants say that neither the legislature nor the municipality can tax vacant lands for such purposes; citing a number of authorities, and, among others, Morford v. Unger, 8 Iowa, 82; Langworthy v. Dubuque, 13 Iowa, 86; O'Hare v. Dubuque, 22 Iowa, 144; Deeds v. Sanborn, 26 Iowa, 419; Deiman v. Fort Madison, 30 Iowa, 542; Cornington v. Southgate, 15 B. Mon. 491; Arbogast v. Louisville, 2 Bush, 271. The Iowa cases fully sustain the contention of counsel, but as long ago as Merrill v. Humphrey, 24 Mich. 170, Justice Cooley, after quoting most of these cases, expressed a doubt as to whether they had not gone too far, and we now think they are clearly against the weight of authority. Cooley on Taxation [2d ed.] p. 157, reads as follows: "City boundaries having been extended so as to embrace the lands of parties who insisted that their premises were agricultural lands merely, and would receive no benefit from the city government, such parties sought the protection of the courts, and prayed for injunction to restrain the imposition upon them of any tax in excess of what they would have been chargeable with had the boundaries not been extended to embrace them. It is to be observed of such cases that the legislature, which alone had authority to determine and fix the proper bounds of the municipal divisions of the state, and also to establish the taxing districts, had proceeded to do so, and in fixing the city boundaries without any provision for a discrimination in the taxation of property within them, had in effect determined that no such discrimination should or ought to be made. The whole subject was one committed by the Constitution exclusively to the judgment and discretion of the legislature, whose members, as in other cases of legislation, would make inquiry into the facts in their own way, and act upon their own reasons. No question could be made of the complete legislative jurisdiction over the case, and if the action was unfair, and led to unequal and unjust consequences, it seems difficult to suggest any ground upon which it could be successfully assailed in the courts that would not warrant a judicial review of legislative action in every case in which parties complain of injustice and inequality. Nevertheless, in some cases the courts have considered themselves warranted in inquiring into the facts, in order to determine whether, in their judgment, the extension of municipal boundaries was fairly warranted; and having reached the conclusion that it was not, and that the extension was made for the purpose of subjecting to taxation adjacent property that would not receive the benefits of municipal government, and was not in fact urban property, they have undertaken to protect the owners of property thus unfairly brought in against the unequal taxation to which the legislation would expose them. In doing this they have not assumed to nullify the legislative action in extending the municipal limits, but they have undertaken to modify and relieve against its consequences, and to do this upon the express ground that the motive which has influenced the legislation was not legitimate. As the point is stated in one case, it is the palpable perversion of the power to tax which justifies the judicial interference. Some of these decisions are made by very able judges, whose opinions are always entitled to the highest respect; but it seems difficult to harmonize them with the conceded principles governing the law of taxation. For, (1) they do not question legislation as being in excess of legislative authority, as might be done where taxes are voted for a purpose not public; but they leave the legislation to stand, and only interfere to qualify its effect, on the ground that it has been adopted on improper grounds and will operate unequally. (2) This is done on an inquiry into the facts, and a substitution of the judicial conclusion for the legislative on a subject not at all judicial; a subject, too,—the proper limits of city extension,—upon which persons are certain to differ widely, and where an inquiry into the facts after the judicial method of an examination of witnesses is usually much less satisfactory than that personal knowledge and investigation which legislators are supposed to possess or to make. This is certainly laying down a rule which cannot be applied generally, it being admitted that the judiciary has no general authority to correct the injustice of legislative action in matters of taxation; and the weight of authority clearly is that, as regards these cases, the determination of the legislature is conclusive." This is undoubtedly according to the great weight of authorities. The inquiry naturally arises, Can the legislature authorize municipalities to own electric lighting plants which shall furnish not only the lights needed by the municipality, but lights to its citizens? Act No. 186 of the Session Laws of 1891 authorizes, in terms, certain municipalities to construct electric lighting plants. Act No. 139 of the Session Laws of 1893 provides "that it shall be lawful for any city or incorporated village in this state, not having more than 8,000 inhabitants, which own land operate works for the purpose of supplying such city or village with electric light, and lighting their streets and other public places with electric light, to furnish and supply electric light to the inhabitants of such cities or villages upon such terms and conditions as the common council may deem expedient." Act No. 41 of the Session Laws of 1895 authorizes cities and villages not having more than 10,000 inhabitants to furnish lights to the citizens. These provisions will stand if furnishing electric lights is a public purpose. This question arose recently in Massachusetts. The house of representatives of that commonwealth asked the opinion of the supreme court upon this question: Is the furnishing of electric lights a public purpose? The court replied in part as follows: "We have no doubt that, if the furnishing of gas and electricity for illuminating purposes is a public service, the performance of this service can be delegated by the legislature to cities and towns for the benefit of themselves and their inhabitants, and that such cities and towns can be authorized to impose taxes for this purpose upon their inhabitants, and to establish reasonable rates which the inhabitants who use the gas or electricity can be compelled to pay. . . . The maintenance of public streets and buildings is a public service and it may be reasonably necessary to light them, in order that the greatest public benefit may be obtained from using them. To say nothing of the usefulness of lighting streets as a means of promoting order and of affording protection to persons and property, the common convenience of the inhabitants may require that they be lighted. Cities and thickly settled towns have for a long time been accustomed to light their public buildings and some of their streets at the public expense. If the streets and public buildings are to be lighted, the means is a matter of expediency. If the legislature can authorize cities and towns to light their streets and public buildings, it can authorize them to do this by any appropriate means which it may think expedient. As a question of constitutional power, we cannot distinguish the right to authorize cities and towns to buy gas or electricity for their use from the right to authorize them to manufacture it for their use. . . . The maintenance of sewers and drains is a public service. One object is the preservation of the public health, but, apart from this, they are a great convenience to the inhabitants whose estates can be drained by them. It is impracticable for every owner of land in cities and towns to construct and maintain sewers and drains exclusively on his own account; they cannot ordinarily be constructed over any considerable territory without using the public ways, or exercising the right of eminent domain. They are therefore regarded as of common convenience, and are constructed at the public expense. The furnishing of water for cities and towns for domestic use affords, perhaps, the nearest analogy to the subject we are considering. It was long ago declared that 'the supply of a large number of inhabitants with pure water is a public purpose.' The statutes are well known which authorize cities and towns to maintain waterworks for supplying their inhabitants with water, and the constitutionality of these statutes has not been doubted. Water cannot ordinarily be supplied to a large city or town from ponds or streams without the exercise of the right of eminent domain and the use of the public ways; every inhabitant needs water, and often the only practicable method of obtaining it is by the agency of corporations or of the municipality. The land for the public ways having been taken for a public use, it may be subjected to other public uses, but it cannot be subjected to strictly private uses without the consent of the owners of the fee when the fee remains in the abutters. There is therefore often a necessity of having water, common to the inhabitants of a community, which cannot well be met except by the exercise of public rights, and therefore the furnishing of water has been considered a public service. In the case of water, as in that of sewers and drains, a portion of the service is exclusively public, and the benefit to individuals cannot be separately estimated from that of the community; but a part of the service is rendered to individuals, and the benefit of this can be separately estimated. The inhabitants are, therefore, required to pay for the water furnished for their private use, and special assessments for the use of sewers and drains are laid upon estates specially benefited; and for the same reasons, while in laying out highways the expense is public, betterment assessments may be laid upon the owners of lands specially benefited. Artificial light is not, perhaps, so absolutely necessary as water, but it is necessary for the comfortable living of every person. Although artificial light can be supplied in other ways than by the use of gas or electricity, yet the use of one or both for lighting cities and thickly settled towns is common, and has been found to be of great convenience, and it is practically impossible for every individual to manufacture gas or electricity for his own use. If gas or electricity is to be generally used in a city or town, it must be furnished by private companies or by the municipality, and it cannot be distributed without the use of the public streets, or the exercise of the right of eminent domain. It is not necessarily an objection to a public work maintained by a city or town that it incidentally benefits some individuals more than others, or that from the place of residence, or for other reasons, every inhabitant of the city or town cannot use it, if every inhabitant who is so situated that he can use it has the same right to use it as the other inhabitants. It must often be a question of kind and degree whether the promotion of the interests of many individuals in the same community constitutes a public service or not. But, in general, it may be said that matters which concern the welfare and convenience of all the inhabitants of a city or town, and cannot be successfully dealt with without the aid of powers derived from the legislature, may be subjected to municipal control when the benefits received are such that each inhabitant needs them, and may participate in them, and it is for the interest of each inhabitant that others, as well as himself, should possess and enjoy them. If the legislature is of opinion that the common convenience and welfare of the inhabitants of cities or towns will be promoted by conferring upon the municipalities the power of manufacturing and distributing gas or electricity for the purpose of furnishing light to their inhabitants, we think that the legislature can confer the power." Opinion of Justices, 150 Mass 592, 8 L. R. A. 487. See Dill. Mun. Corp. p. 828, note; Rushville Gas Co. v. Rushville, 121 Ind. 206, 6 L. R. A. 315; Crawfordsville v. Braden, 130 Ind. 149, 14 L. R. A. 268. In this case the recent authorities are referred to, and reviewed. State, Atty. Gen. v. Toledo, 11 L. R. A. 729, 48 Ohio St. 112; Conley, Taxn. 134. It is conceded by counsel for complainants that municipalities may furnish water to their citizens. They seek to distinguish the right to furnish water from the right to furnish light by saying that water is a necessity for all, but that electric light is a luxury. It will hardly be contended that the necessities of modern life do not require light as well as water, and we think the reasoning of the cases cited shows conclusively that it is within the legislative province to confer upon municipalities the right to furnish both under proper restrictions.

The decree is affirmed, with costs.

I. Extent of power over buildings as such.

A municipal authority has the power, without special legislative grant, to prohibit the erection of works and factories, and the pursuit of industries, within the corporate limits which will be injurious to the public health, and destructive of the comfort of the inhabitants, by subjecting them, in crowded streets, to nauseous smells and sickening odors. Monroe v. Hoffman, 29 La. Ann. 631, 656, 29 Am. Rep. 345, 346.

In relation to the power of municipalities over buildings and other structures as nuisances, it has been said that the rights of property, like all other social and conventional rights, are subject to such reasonable limitations in their enjoyment as shall prevent them from being injurious, and to such reasonable restraints and regulations established by law, as the legislature, under the governing and controlling power, vested in them, by the Constitution, may think necessary and expedient. McKibbin v. Fort Smith, 35 Ark. 352, 355. To the same effect, Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 84.

So, in Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 84, the court stated it as a general principle, growing out of the nature of well-ordered civil society, that every holder of property, however absolute and unqualified may be his title, holds it under the implied liability that his use of it may be so regulated that it shall not be injurious to the equal enjoyment of others having an equal right to the enjoyment of their property, nor injurious to the rights of the community, all property being derived directly or indirectly from the government and held subject to those general fact is not, although it is empowered by law to declare what shall constitute a nuisance.

2. An ordinance declaring that any building or structure of any kind partially destroyed by fire which shall be permitted to remain in such condition after notification to remove, repair, or rebuild it shall constitute a nuisance, without making any limi-regulations which are necessary to the common good and general welfare.

Again, in Harvey v. Dewoody, 13 Ark. 252, in an action for damages for destroying the plaintiff's house as a nuisance, it is said: The mayor and councilmen have the right to have the nuisance complained of removed or abated in some of the modes provided by law, even though, in doing so, it should be found necessary to destroy the house or tenement.

So, in Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 659, 669, 24 L. ed. 1036, 1039, the court admitted the right of the public authorities over buildings and the destruction of them to prevent fire, such right being given by the common law, although in that case the nuisance consisted in the carrying on of an offensive trade.

In the exercise of its police power, the legislature may not only provide that certain kinds of property, either absolutely, or when held in such a manner or under such circumstances as to be injurious, dangerous, or obnoxious, may be seized and confiscated upon legal process after notice and hearing, but may also, when necessary to insure the public safety, authorize them to be summarily destroyed by the municipal authorities without previous notice to the owner, as in cases, inter alia, of the destruction of buildings, in order to prevent the spread of fire, or the impending falling of the buildings, or throwing overboard of decaying or infected food, or abating other nuisances dangerous to health. Blair v. Forehand, 100 Mass. 130, 139, 1 Am. Rep. 94. To the same effect, Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 85; Fisher v. McGirr, 1 Gray. 27, 61 Am. Dec. 381; Parsons v. Pettingell, 11 Allen, 512; Salem v. Eastern R. Co. 98 Mass. 443, 98 Am. Dec. 650; License Cases, 46 U. S. 5 How. 561, 559, 632, 13 L. ed. 221, 224, 314; Dewey v. White, Moody & M. 55; Field v. Des Moines, 39 Iowa, 575, 18 Am. Rep. 44.

Two things are necessary to constitute a public nuisance in a building: first, that from the nature of the establishment it may be a nuisance, and second, that from its situation it has actually become so. State v. Purse, 4 McCord, 1, 472, 474.

A house which, from the purpose for which it is used or the situation in which it is placed may not be a nuisance, may become so from the negligent and filthy state in which it is kept. State v. Purse, 4 McCord, 1, 472, 474.

So, the erection of any building which, from its disagreeable odor or noxious effluvia, is offensive or unwholesome may be a nuisance, but whether it actually is or is not so must depend upon circumstances. A house that is a nuisance in one place may not be so in another. State v. Purse, 4 McCord, 1, 472, 474.

When, however, property has become a nuisance dangerous to the public health, municipal authorities, when invested with power to abate nuisances, have a right to make such disposition of it as may be necessary for the protection of the public, and they may do this without making compensation to the owner. Schoen v. Atlanta, 97 Ga. 697, 33 L. R. A. 804. To the same effect, Dunbar v. Augusta, 90 Ga. 390; Savannah v. Mulligan, 95 Ga. 323, 29 L. R. A. 308. See also note to Orlando v. Pragg (Fla.) 19 L. R. A. 196.

tations with regard to its dangerous character by reason of its weak condition or location or surroundings, is void.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Vanderburgh County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enjoin the collection of an assessment for the removal of a building from plaintiff's property which was alleged to have become a nuisance. Affirmed.

Municipal corporations have full power to abate nuisances, and may if necessary remove or compel the removal of buildings which have for any cause become nuisances, by getting into such a condition that they greatly endanger the public health or safety, or the safety of adjacent property, provided the danger inheres in the building and not simply in the use to which the building is put. First Nat. Bank v. Sarlis, 129 Ind. 201, 18 L. R. A. 481; Reg. v. Pappineau, 1 Strange, 668.

So, if a building is erected in violation of law and in a situation where it imperils personal property, no private right is invaded by its abatement as a nuisance, because none can grow out of an illegal act. Baumgartner v. Hasty, 100 Ind. 575, 576, 50 Am. Rep. 380.

A building dilapidated and vacated by reason of fire, occupied temporarily by disorderly persons and trespassers and used as a receptacle of filth, may become a common nuisance as recognized by law. Hennessy v. St. Paul, 37 Fed. Rep. 565.

And an unoccupied house used in such a manner as to endanger a town by fire, and also in a manner offensive to the citizens as endangering their lives, is a common or public nuisance such as may be removed by the city authorities. Harvey v. De-woody, 18 Ark. 252, 256.

In Swett v. Sprague, 55 Me. 190, the court upheld the action of the city authorities in pulling down and removing the plaintiff's brick building, after notice to abate the same as a public nuisance given pursuant to the terms of the state statute, the statute being legal and constitutional.

So, in Van Wormer v. Albany, 15 Wend. 262, the proceedings of the board of health in pulling down and destroying the plaintiff's barn and sheds as a nuisance, dangerous to the health and lives of the inhabitants of the city, were upheld, for the reason that it is necessary that such power should exist and be exercised upon the proper emergencies, the statute giving a summary remedy to remove or abate nuisances.

But the taking or injuring of private property for the public benefit is the exercise of a high power, and all the conditions and limitations provided by law under which it may be done must be closely followed. Frank v. Atlanta, 72 Ga. 423, 432.

So, the fact that a certain structure will constitute a nuisance, when erected, or that a building of which such structure is to form a part will, when such structure is completed, constitute such a nuisance, must be affirmatively proved with clearness and reasonable certainty. Rochester v. Erickson, 46 Barb. 92, 95.

If the property is not a nuisance per se, and is lawfully erected without being judicially determined to be a nuisance, or is not created or erected subsequent to the date and in defiance of the ordinance, the municipality has no power to destroy it. Denver v. Mullen, 7 Colo. 345, 353.

Yet the action of a city council, acting under its ordinance and charter, declaring certain premises a nuisance, is a prima facie protection to the city council, and casts the burden of proof upon the

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George A. Cunningham and Elmer Q. Lockyear for appellants.

Messrs. Alexander Gilchrist and Curran A. De Bruler, for appellee:

The common council of Evansville has no power to enact by ordinance or otherwise that a building or other structure which has been partially destroyed and is suffered to remain in that condition shall from that fact alone be necessarily a nuisance, and that such a building may be taken down and removed by the city at the expense of the owner.

party calling the action of the council into question. Montgomery v. Hutchinson, 18 Ala. 573.

And therefore, under the power given to a city by its charter to remove all nuisances at the expense of the person causing them, or upon whose property such nuisance may be found, a city has authority to declare a fallen and dilapidated house or brick building in the city, which renders the passage of the sidewalk dangerous, a nuisance, and such declaration is prima facie evidence that such house is a nuisance, and the onus of disproving it rests upon the party maintaining the same. Montgomery v. Hutchinson, 18 Ala. 573.

Where the common council declares an old cement house to be a nuisance, and removes the same after notice to the owner, the act being done by the city authorities or under their direction in order to abate the nuisance, the owner of such house is not precluded, by the proceedings of such council, from contesting their action, as the mere declaration of a city that such building is a nuisance does not make it so, under Iowa Code, § 454, which gives cities and towns power to abate nuisances but contains no express or necessarily implied power to declare that a nuisance exists. Cole v. Kegler, 64 Iowa, 59, 62.

So, under the provisions of a charter and ordinance giving authority to abate and remove nuisances injurious to public health and safety, and to remove any dilapidated buildings which are imminently dangerous to life and property, or which, through defects in structure or other causes may become imminently dangerous to life or property, no exclusive jurisdiction is conferred upon the common council to determine what constitutes a nuisance, and therefore such council can only abate such cases as are declared such by the common law. Hennessy v. St. Paul, 37 Fed. Rep. 565.

And in Frank v. Atlanta, 72 Ga. 423, 432, it is said to be questionable, under § 145, of the city charter, (Ga. Acts 1874, p. 147), whether the mayor and general council of the city of Atlanta have authority, upon the report of its building inspectors and engineer, to destroy a building reported as unsafe, but which is not located on any street, alley, or lane of the city.

But under a condition contained in a subsequently repealed ordinance authorizing the erection of a warehouse which the defendant after notice has failed to remove as a nuisance, the corporation has the power at any time to cause it to be removed at his expense. Herbert v. Benson, 2 La. Ann. 770.

By chapter 519 of the Laws of New York of 1870 every building erected contrary to a city ordinance is to be deemed a common nuisance, and as such may be abated. Young v. Scheu, 56 Hun. 307, 303. In that case, however, the action was brought at the instance of a private individual to restrain the erection of a frame building contrary to the provisions of the ordinance, but the court refused relief, the police regulation not giving a remedy to a private party, no special damage being shown.

Old and almost worthless houses, filthy in condi-

Tiedeman, Pol. Power, § 123; Wood, Nuisances, § 744; First Nat. Bank v. Sarila, 129 Ind. 201, 18 L. R. A. 481; Begein v. Anderson, 38 Ind. 79; Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 984.

A partially destroyed building is not of itself more likely to be a nuisance than a cheap, ugly ill-formed building of any kind. A cheap building upon a street devoted to residences may be so cheap, so despicable in appearance, so unsightly, as to injuriously affect the value of all neighboring property. But be such a building never so much of an eyesore, unless it is otherwise a nuisance, unless it is dangerous to health, life, or limb, the owner can maintain it despite the protests of his neighbors or of the city.

Wood, Nuisances, § 8; State v. Jersey City, 29 N. J. L. 170; Des Plaines v. Poyer, 123 Ill. 348; Ex parte O'Leary, 65 Miss. 80; Pauer v. Albrecht, 72 Wis. 416.

Jordan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was instituted by appellees to prevent the collection of certain assessments tion and crowded with filthy tenants, which have been occupied by patients afflicted with the small-pox, situated in an improved and flourishing part of the city, and not repaired or improved by the owner, who is able to do so, are properly condemned as nuisances by the board of health, and may be removed as such by the city authorities, under the provisions of an act giving the city council power to prevent and remove all nuisances within the city, the act having special reference to decayed and dilapidated houses. Ferguson v. Selma, 43 Ala. 398, 400.

And where the act incorporating the town confers power upon the mayor or the council to prevent and remove nuisances, the authorities are clothed with unquestionable legislative powers and prerogatives to a certain extent, and are fully empowered to adopt measures of police for the purpose of preserving the health and promoting the comfort, convenience, and general welfare of the inhabitants of the town, among which powers are those for the preservation of the public health and property; and therefore city authorities are justified, under a town ordinance, in pulling down an unoccupied house used in a manner which endangers the town in cases of fire, and also offensive to the citizens, especially after the time limited by the notice of the city authorities to abate or remove the nuisance has expired. Harvey v. De-woody, 18 Ark. 322, 329.

So, where the incorporating and governing act gives the city and town council power to regulate the building of houses, and guard against accidents by fire, and to prohibit the erection, and provide for the removal, of any building, or any addition to any building more than 10 feet high, unless the outer walls thereof are brick and mortar, or iron, or stone and mortar, the city council may proceed in a summary manner to remove the same so as to prevent it becoming a nuisance or dangerous to the public. McKibbin v. Fort Smith, 35 Ark. 322, 355.

And the erection of a building was restrained as a nuisance, in Coast Co. v. Spring Lake (N. J. Ch.) 36 Atl. 21.

The ruins of a structure upon one of the principal streets of a city, unfit for human habitation or other lawful use, devoted to no use or purpose, but as a resort for tramps and disorderly persons, and a source of serious discomfort and annoyance to the public and of actual danger to useful and valuable property within the range of its influence, are within the definition of the term "public nuisance," which the city has power to declare a nuisance and to abate as such, the primary cause of public annoyance and danger being the decayed, dilapidated, ruined, and abandoned condition of the building. Nazworthy v. Sullivan, 55 Ill. App. 43, 51.

The Massachusetts Statutes of 1867, chap. 308, enabling the city to abate a nuisance existing therein and for the preservation of the public health, under which the city took the plaintiff's lands for the purpose of abating such nuisances, are valid coming within the clause of the Constitution L. R. A.

tution which confers authority upon the legislature to make all manner of wholesome and reasonable laws so as the same be not repugnant or contrary to the Constitution. Dingley v. Boston, 100 Mass. 544. In that case, however, the owner of the land was held entitled to compensation by reason of the nuisance being such that it was not within his power to abate, and no indictment could lie against him for its maintenance.

Again, in a case where the sanitary superintendent of the city-health department certifies to the board that a certain building is "unfit, and not reasonably capable of being made fit, for human habitation by reason of want of proper ventilation, want of repair and defects in the drainage and plumbing, and because of the existence of a nuisance on the premises likely to cause sickness among its occupants, and that the occupancy of said building is dangerous to life and detrimental to health," which condition is also determined by the board to exist, and an order is issued for the removal of the same, and for a vacation of the premises, forbidding their further use as a human habitation without a written permit, it is the function of the board, exclusively confided to it by the legislature, to determine whether a cause exists for the exercise of the power, and, having so determined, the court will not assume to reverse its action, unless it appears that such action is arbitrary, oppressive, or repugnant to justice; and in such a case the owner is not entitled to notice of the proceedings and is not deprived of the property without due process of law. Eagan v. New York Health Dept., 20 Misc. 33.

So, the certificate of the city surveyor to the effect that the buildings in question are eminently dangerous, and the authority of the town clerk to such surveyor to cause the same to be taken down and repaired in such manner as he shall think requisite, are sufficient authority to justify the taking down and rebuilding of certain portions of such building, and also to warrant the action of the corporation in demanding payment from the property owner of the expenses thereby incurred, the action being for the purpose of preventing danger in the creation of a nuisance. Cheetham v. Manchester, L. R. 10 C. P. 249, 44 L. J. C. P. N. S. 139, 33 L. T. N. S. 28.

And the 27th section of the Pennsylvania act of 1818, which makes it necessary for the board of health to obtain a warrant from the justice of the peace for the inspection of the premises where the alleged nuisance is said to exist, does not apply where the nuisance exists on a vacant lot, and therefore such nuisance may be abated by the authorities without a warrant and a visit by the board, such act having reference only to cases where such nuisance exists in a house, store, cellar, or other inclosure. Kennedy v. Philadelphia Bd. of Health, 2 Pa. 366, 370.

A city ordinance, passed pursuant to its charter, which declares all buildings and structures in a situation or manner dangerous to the public to be nuisances, will be upheld. Kiley v. Kansas, 69 Mo. 102, 33 Am. Rep. 491. In that case, however, levied by the board of public works of the city of Evansville on certain real estate owned by appellee, and situated within the city. The theory of the complaint is that this assessment of $199 is void by reason of the invalidity in part of an ordinance under which the city undertook to levy said assessment. A trial resulted in a finding by the court in favor of the appellee, and a judgment was awarded canceling the assessment, and adjudging void the lien claimed thereunder by the city. The facts in the record show that the appellee, Miller, in May, 1895, became the owner by purchase of lots 6, 7, 8, and 9 in block 7 of Goodsell's enlargement of the city of Evansville, and that the dwelling house situated on said premises at the time he became the owner thereof had been partially destroyed by fire. On June 24, 1893, the common council of that city passed an ordinance defining nuisances, etc. The 1st section of this ordinance provides as follows: "Be it ordained by the common council of the city of Evansville, that any building, shed, outhouse, or structure of any kind that shall be partially destroyed by fire, or from any other cause, and shall be the question turned upon the liability of the corporation for not enforcing the ordinance.

So, a wall situated upon private property at the edge of a sidewalk in a dilapidated and decayed condition by reason of fire, dangerous to the lives of passersby, is a nuisance within the provisions of a city charter, which may be abated by the city. Parker v. Macon, 39 Ga. 725, 729, 99 Am. Dec. 496.

And the destruction of an unhealthy house by the municipal authorities is justifiable, the same being a nuisance within the provisions of the Tennessee act of January 29, 1879. Theilan v. Porter, 14 Lea, 622, 52 Am. Rep. 173.

But where such structures were attached to a public market, the power of the public authorities to remove them was denied. Hoffman v. Schultz, 81 How. Pr. 885, 896.

Under a charter giving power to municipalities to pass ordinances relating to nuisances, a structure erected in violation of an ordinance so enacted may be abated as such by the authorities. Lake v. Aberdeen, 57 Miss. 260, 263.

Again, such authorities have been held justified in destroying, breaking down, and injuring a fertilizer and the machinery used in manufacturing the same, as a nuisance. Manhattan Mfg. & F. Co. v. Van Keuren, 23 N. J. Eq. 251, 255.

And tenement houses built over tannery vats and declared a nuisance by the board of health in time of cholera, were held rightly destroyed, in Meeker v. Van Benselear, 15 Wend. 397, and Van Wormer v. Albany, 18 Wend. 169.

Yet the question whether a building erected inside the fire limits of a city and declared a nuisance by the city ordinance is such or not is one of fact for the jury. Frank v. Atlanta, 73 Ga. 423.

So, the question whether the defendant is guilty of unnecessarily erecting a building in a situation which is offensive and a nuisance to the neighborhood, or whether the inconvenience which is experienced is a necessary result of circumstances which are beyond his control, is a question for the jury and not for the court. State v. Purse, 4 McCord, L. 472, 474.

Under the Georgia Code, however, notice is necessary before a house can be pulled down or destroyed by such authorities in order to abate a nuisance. Pruden v. Love, 67 Ga. 190, 192.

And the Tennessee act of January 29, 1879, condemning all buildings, cisterns, wells, privies, and other erections in the taxing district which on inspection are found to be unhealthy as nuisances does not conflict with the provisions of the Constitution. Theilan v. Porter, 14 Lea, 622, 52 Am. Rep. 173.

So, where the building or structure is erected, or encroaches, upon the highway, the same has been held to be abatable by the municipal authorities as a nuisance.

Where the erection or structure itself constitutes a nuisance, as where it is put up in a public street, its removal is necessary for the abatement of a nuisance. Barclay v. Com. 25 Pa. 503, 505, 64 Am. Dec. 715.

And under an ordinance empowering the authorities to remove buildings or other obstructions or nuisances from streets, it is the city's duty to remove the same. Parker v. Macon, 39 Ga. 725, 729.

And this is so for the reason that the placing of a building upon a highway is a nuisance at common law. Com. v. Blaisdell, 107 Mass. 234; Com. v. King, 13 Met. 115; Stoughton v. Porter, 13 Allen, 191.

A stone column standing in a street so as to interfere with public travel is a nuisance per se, and may be abated in a summary way. Chase v. Oshkosh, 81 Wis. 313, 15 L. R. A. 553.

So, a wall extending 10 feet into a highway, even though it leaves sufficient room to pass and repass safely, is a nuisance abatable by the public authorities under the Connecticut General Statutes. State v. Knapp, 6 Conn. 415, 16 Am. Dec. 63.

Again, a house built beyond the street line marked out by the city surveyor may be pulled down and removed by the city authorities, the same being a nuisance as an obstruction of the street. Daublin v. New Orleans, 1 Mart. (La.) 135.

And the front steps leading to a dwelling house are clearly part of a building, and when they project into the highway the building is in the highway within the meaning of the Massachusetts statutes declaring such building a nuisance. Com. v. Blaisdell, 107 Mass. 234; Hyde v. Middlesex County, 2 Gray, 267.

But it has been held that Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 19, § 13, authorizing cities to make "such rules and regulations for the erection and maintenance of balustrades, or other projections upon the roofs and sides of buildings therein as the safety of the public requires," do not confer on the municipal authorities power to pass an ordinance prohibiting the maintenance of doorsteps in the highway where such steps were lawfully placed there under the provisions of Mass. Stat. chap. 16, § 3, even though the city charter empowers the authorities to make "all such salutary and needful by-laws as towns, by the laws of this commonwealth, have power to make and establish," the words of the statute not being broad enough to authorize cities to make rules and regulations for the erection and maintenance of doorsteps within the actual limits of the highway. Cushing v. Boston, 128 Mass. 330, 331, 35 Am. Rep. 383.

In construing the above act the court stated that the language of the section intended to deal with those parts of a building which might project near or over the line of a highway, and which, if not properly constructed and maintained, would endanger the safety of the public, and that it did not attempt to deal with those additions to or parts of a building which might occupy the highway itself or obstruct travel thereon, and thus constitute a nuisance in a highway if not authorized by law. Cushing v. Boston, 128 Mass. 330, 331, 35 Am. Rep. 383.

Under Mass. Stat. 1824, chap. 16, § 3, steps projecting less than 8 feet into the highway, properly constructed and in good repair, can be lawfully maintained, and are not a nuisance, and do not constisuffered by the owner thereof to remain in such condition, after being notified by the department of public works to remove, repair, or rebuild the same, shall constitute a nuisance. Any building, shed, outhouse or structure of any kind that shall become filthy or unwholesome is hereby declared to be a nuisance." The part assailed by the appellee as invalid is indicated by italics. Section 2 provides that whenever the department of public works shall have knowledge "that any nuisance such as is defined in § 1 of this ordinance exists in said city, it shall thereupon make an order requiring the owner thereof to abate the same within such time as said department may fix." This section further provides for giving notice to such owner of the order, and declares it lawful for said department to remove such buildings or structures, in whole or in part, by persons employed by it, or by letting such work by contract, etc. Section 3 contains provisions for assessing the cost of the removal of the building against the real estate in like manner as assessments of benefits are made. On July 13, 1895, the department of public works of the city, under this ordinance, made an order tute an illegal obstruction of the highway. Cushing v. Boston, 123 Mass. 330, 331, 35 Am. Rep. 333, 122 Mass. 173, 124 Mass. 424.

Again, the steps of a building, and extension thereof into the public street contrary to the provisions of an ordinance specially forbidding it, are a public nuisance abatable by the public authorities. Norfolk City v. Chamberlaine, 29 Gratt. 534, 539.

So, it has been held that such authorities have power to remove as a public nuisance a fruit and confectionery store placed upon the sidewalk. Com. v. Wentworth, Brightly (Pa.) 318.

And in People, Bentley, v. New York, 18 Abb. N. C. 123, a mandamus was granted to compel the removal of a show case as a nuisance upon a street as extending beyond the house line.

Again, the action of the public authorities in removing show-boards and signs from the sidewalk was upheld in Com. v. McCafferty, 145 Mass. 384, under chap. 18, § 14, and chap. 27, § 15, Mass. Pub. Stat.

So, the obstruction of a public street or square by reason of a horse rack was declared a nuisance, and abated as such, in Samuels v. Nashville, 3 Sneed, 298.

And the erection of a nuisance in a public square is restrainable at the instance of the municipal authorities. Watertown v. Cowen, 4 Paige, 510, 27 Am. Dec. 80, 82.

Upon this ground it was held that such authorities were justified in removing and abating as a public nuisance a county jail and cess-pool connected therewith situated in a public square, the same being dangerous to health. Liano v. Liano County, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 132.

And a city ordinance prohibiting the erection of private hospitals within the city limits upon the ground that the same may be injurious to health and so become a nuisance has been upheld in Milne v. Davidson, 5 Mart. N. S. 409, 18 Am. Dec. 180, 191.

II. Limit of power.

a. In general.

As to the limit of the power of municipal corporations over nuisances in general, see note to Grossman v. Oakland (Or.) 36 L. R. A. 593.

A municipal corporation without any general laws either of the city or the state within which a given structure can be shown to be a nuisance cannot, by its mere declaration that it is one, subject it to removal by any person supposed to be aggrieved, or even by the city itself. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Joliet, 79 Ill. 26, 44; Quintini v. Bay St. Louis, 64 Miss. 483, 60 Am. Rep. 62; Nazworthy v. Sullivan, 55 Ill. App. 43, 51; Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 503, 19 L. ed. 986.

Although a building erected in violation of a valid ordinance may be removed without reference to its character, yet cities can only condemn as nuisances, and compel the removal of, buildings which are in themselves for some reason dangerous or hurtful. First Nat. Bank v. Sarila, 129 Ind. 301, 13 L. R. A. 481.

And so much only of the thing as causes the nuisance must be removed. Babcock v. Buffalo, 1 Sheldon, 817, 823, Affirmed 56 N. Y. 268.

While the charter may confer power upon a municipality to pass ordinances on the subject of nuisances, yet it does not confer the right to declare a particular business or structure, not condemned by any law or ordinance, a nuisance, and to have the structure removed or the business stopped or interfered with. Lake v. Aberdeen, 57 Miss. 280, 283.

A city council cannot declare a particular structure a nuisance in a summary manner and at its pleasure. Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 503, 19 L. ed. 986.

And such authorities have no power to declare a particular structure, such as a flouring mill, not condemned by any law or ordinance, to be a nuisance, and to remove the same, even though their charter empowers them to regulate and prevent the carrying on of manufactures dangerous, causing or promoting fires, and to prevent and abate nuisances. Lake v. Aberdeen, 57 Miss. 280, 283.

The power given the common council, by resolution, to compel the owners or occupants of any wall or building within the city which is unsafe or ruinous, to render the same safe or to take down or remove the same and to prohibit such erections, and to require a summary removal or abatement of nuisances or substances likely to become such, from any street, lot, or building, does not authorize the corporation to enter upon private property and abate a private nuisance, and in such case it can only act indirectly by putting a command upon the owner and by punishing his disobedience under a certain section of its charter. Cain v. Syracuse, 95 N. Y. 83, 89.

So, they cannot, by an arbitrary ordinance, destroy private property by force or compel the owner to have it removed, if it is not a nuisance in fact, or so declared by the ordinance, and shown to be such by its location in the city or town, or by its sanitary condition. Pieri v. Sheldaboro, 42 Miss. 498, 495.

Again, structures attached to a public market cannot be summarily removed or destroyed by the public authorities. Hoffman v. Schultz, 31 How. Pr. 385, 386.

A municipal corporation before it can, by its mere declaration that a dwelling house is a nuisance, subject it to removal, must first resort to some proper judicial proceeding, giving the owner or occupant an opportunity to be heard. Teas v. St. Albans, 38 W. Va. 1, 19 L. R. A. 802, in which case it was sought to restrain the action of the city authorities in tearing down the plaintiff's house, which was alleged to encroach on a public street.

And this is so for the reason that the right of property cannot be invaded under the guise of a police regulation for the preservation of health, when it is manifest that such is not the object and purpose of the regulation. Austin v. Murray, 16 Pick. 121, 126, in which case the Massachusetts Statutes of 1832, chapter 150, establishing a board of health for the town of Charleston, and the burial as follows: "And now it is ordered by the department of public works of the city of Evansville: That whereas, the buildings situated on last 6, 7, 8, and 9 in block 7 in Goodsell's enlargement in said city have been partially destroyed by fire, and have been suffered by the owner thereof to remain in such condition for a period of twelve months, and by reason thereof have created a nuisance: Now, therefore, it is ordered by said department that the owner of said real estate abate said nuisance by the removal of the whole of said building, or so much thereof as remains unconsumed, together with all offal, dirt, débris of every kind, situate thereon, on or before the 17th day of August, 1893. And, it appearing that John A. Miller, the owner of said real estate, is a non-resident of the city of Evansville, it is ordered that he be notified of this resolution by publication in a newspaper published in said city. At the expiration of said time, if such owner shall not have abated such nuisance, this department will proceed to abate the same by the removal of such structure, and by such other means as may be deemed necessary." After the time designated in this order for the

of the dead in a certain burying ground, was held invalid upon the above ground as absolutely prohibiting the use of property, and upon the further ground that it was wholly unauthorized by the act of the legislature.

The action of the trustees of a village under their charter, in declaring an encroachment, by building 6 feet into a street, to be a nuisance, is not conclusive of the fact that the same is a nuisance, the same not being a nuisance per se, and therefore its removal as a nuisance by a committee appointed by them is unwarranted. Howard v. Robbins, 1 Lans. 63.

In People, Copcutt, v. Yonkers Bd. of Health, 140 N. Y. 1, 23 L. R. A. 481, the court stated that whoever abates an alleged nuisance, and thus destroys and injures private property or interferes with private rights, whether he is a public officer or a private person, unless he acts under the judgment or order of a court having jurisdiction, does it at his peril, and, when his act is challenged in the regular judicial tribunals, to protect him, it must appear that the thing abated is a nuisance in fact.

And it is not allowable for one or more citizens to exhibit a bill of complaint, alleging that certain buildings or operations are a nuisance, not within any law or ordinance previously passed and operating on all, but because of certain facts set forth in the petition, and to procure a decree to abate such alleged nuisance, not as being a violation of a precedent enactment, but by virtue of a decree of the mayor and selectmen that it is so in the given case. Lake v. Aberdeen, 57 Miss. 260, 263, in this case the authorities sought to declare a flouring mill a nuisance, and to have it taken down or removed as such on the petition of the citizens.

At common law, municipal corporations are only authorized to interfere with the erection and repair of buildings so far as to prevent the doing of that which from its nature would have a tendency to create or enhance danger and so become nuisances. First Nat. Bank v. Sarlis, 129 Ind. 201, 13 L. R. A. 481.

So, towns may not, in their corporate capacity, proceed by adversary methods by their own trustees, to adjudge a particular property or structure a nuisance, and by order against the owner secure its abatement. American Furniture Co. v. Batesville, 139 Ind. 77, and 35 N. E. 682.

And a city cannot, by means of its ordinance enacted under the terms of its charter, prohibit the building of any house in a certain locality and on certain roads or streets, without a special permit, and declare such house a nuisance, especially where it only cut off the breeze from, and the view of, the adjoining property, and such an ordinance is void and unconstitutional as the harmless, proper, and ordinary use of property cannot be converted into a nuisance by a mere declaration making it such. Quintini v. Bay St. Louis, 84 Miss. 483, 60 Am. Rep. 62.

And a special charter authorizing the council of a city not incorporated or acting under the general law of corporations of cities, "to regulate all wharves on the shore of the Ohio river adjoining 38 L. R. A.

the said city, whether the same be public or private, and the amount of wharfage to be charged at or for the use of the same" does not give the city authorities power, by ordinance, to declare certain things thereon erected or placed to be nuisances, or to provide for the establishment of a water line at high-water mark, and to declare any buildings or erections below such line of high-water mark at any place within the corporate limits of the city to be a nuisance. Evansville v. Martin, 41 Ind. 145.

So, in EVANSVILLE v. MILLER it is held that a city, authorized by statute to declare what shall constitute a nuisance, and to require its abatement, and to assess the expenses of its removal against the person causing or suffering the same to exist, cannot declare a partially burned building to be a nuisance, for the reason that by so doing it attempts to declare that a nuisance which in fact cannot be said to be so; and even though such power may be conferred by the legislature it is utterly inoperative, unless the thing declared to be a nuisance is one in fact, or is created or erected after the adoption of the ordinance and in defiance thereof.

b. To destroy.

Where the nuisance is not in the building itself, but in the use to which it is put, the authorities cannot declare the building a nuisance and order its removal, but the cause of the offense must be removed. Nazworthy v. Sullivan, 55 Ill. App. 48, 51; Dupree v. Brunswick, 82 Ga. 727, 729; First Nat. Bank v. Sarlis, 129 Ind. 201, 13 L. R. A. 481; Czarniecki v. Bollman (Pa.) 10 Cent. Rep. 96; Chicago v. Union Stock Yards & T. Co. 164 Ill. 224, 35 L. R. A. 281; Reg. v. Pappineau, 1 Strange, 686; Brown v. Perkins, 12 Gray, 89, 100.

A building is not to be torn down or removed when the nuisance consists in the use to which it is put, and not in the building itself. Allison v. Richmond, 51 Mo. App. 183, 186.

So, where a nuisance is not caused by the erection of buildings themselves, but by the persons who resort thereto, the municipal authorities have sufficient power to suppress the nuisance without resorting to the demolition of the building. Miller v. Burch, 32 Tex. 208, 5 Am. Rep. 242.

And the town council have no such power to declare premises, left unoccupied, and resorted to by various persons as a "sink," a nuisance, and to order its sale and removal, the nuisance not being in the building itself, but in the use of it by the persons who resorted thereto. Miller v. Burch, 32 Tex. 208, 5 Am. Rep. 242.

Property is not to be destroyed until its destruction is lawfully ascertained to be necessary in order to stop the nuisance and then no other, or no more, of it is to be destroyed than is thus determined to be needful to effect that object. Shepard v. People, 40 Mich. 487, 492. Welch v. Stowell, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 382; Bloomhuff v. State, 8 Blackf. 206; State v. Kaster, 35 Iowa, 221; Finley v. Hershey, 41 Iowa, 899; Brightman v. Bristol, 65 Me. 426, 20 Am. Rep. 711; Miller v. Burch, 32 Tex. 208, 5 Am. Rep. 242, to the same effect.

removal of the building, the appellee, the board of public works, made the following order for its removal: "It is hereby ordered and directed by the board of public works of the city of Evansville that the clerk advertise for bids for removing all that part of the 'Jordan Giles' residence on Washington avenue, above the stone foundation, stacking all good lumber and brick on the premises, and removing all rubbish and burnt lumber from the premises."

It was admitted by the parties in the lower court that the proceedings by the city in the matter in controversy were regular and consistent with the requirements of the ordinance, and that the assessment to the amount of $199 was made against the real estate of appellee as alleged in the complaint, and that appellant Schwacke had complied with his contract in removing the partially destroyed building from the premises in question. It is clear, we think, that the city of Evansville, through her duly constituted authorities, in ordering the removal of this partially destroyed building, and in assessing the expense of such work upon appellee's real estate, proceeded under that Even though buildings which have been condemned to destruction by a board of health as being nuisances detrimental to public health may not have been capable of being made fit for habitation, yet if they can be so put in repair that the ill smells will be removed and the sources of contagion taken away, the buildings will cease to be a nuisance, and the fact that they might not thereby be made fit for habitation would not authorize their destruction, and if they cease to be in such a condition as to bring pestilence and spread disease, and are rendered innoxious the owner of them has a right to have them remain upon the premises even though he may not be permitted to use them as tenement houses, for the reason that there are other uses to which he may lawfully put them, and the undoubted power of the public to refuse him permission to rent them for human habitation would not necessarily involve the right to destroy them if they were not used for that purpose. New York Health Dept. v. Dassori, 21 App. Div. 348.

If buildings which have been condemned to destruction by a board of health were themselves put into a proper condition the fact that they were located within a short distance of other buildings used as tenement houses, and that the close proximity of the two deprived each of them of the ventilation necessary to render them fit for the use to which the owners intended to put them, namely, that of habitation, yet such fact would not warrant the destruction of the buildings although it might furnish a good reason why the other buildings, not being supplied with sufficient air so that they could be occupied by a number of people, might be vacated. New York Health Dept. v. Dassori, 21 App. Div. 348.

In such cases the right to condemn grows out of the right to destroy the building because it is a public nuisance and can be abated in no other way, and unless that is made to appear there can be no final order for condemnation. New York Health Dept. v. Dassori, 21 App. Div. 348.

The object of the New York consolidated act, Laws 1882, chap. 410, as amended by chap. 587 of the Laws of 1895, giving power to the board of health to condemn buildings for the purpose of suppressing nuisances, was to meet evils seriously causing severe epidemics to suppress which it is necessary to take summary measures to prevent such nuisances. New York Health Dept. v. Dassori, 21 App. Div. 348.

All that the owner of any building can be called upon to do with regard to that building if he desires to use it as a tenement house is to keep it in such a condition as the statute requires, and if he does so he has complied with the law and his building is not a nuisance, and he cannot be compelled to submit to the destruction of his building if on his own land, for the reason that other buildings adjacent to it are deprived of proper ventilation. New York Health Dept. v. Dassori, 21 App. Div. 348.

So, property cannot be declared a nuisance for the purpose of devoting it to destruction. Lawton v. Steele, 119 N. Y. 220, 7 L. R. A. 134. 383 L. R. A.

The power to abate nuisances does not warrant the destruction of valuable property lawfully erected, or of a thing erected by lawful authority. First Nat. Bank v. Sarila, 129 Ind. 201, 18 L. R. A. 481.

A building cannot be abated simply on account of its noxious use, if not absolutely necessary to prevent it; the nuisance itself must only be abated and nothing more. State, Rodwell, v. Newark, 34 N. J. L. 284, 287.

And where the offense consists in the wrongful use of what is harmless in itself the remedy is to stop such use and not to tear down or remove the structure. United States Illuminating Co. v. Grant, 55 Hun. 225; Moody v. Niagara County Supers. 46 Barb. 659, 665, 666; Barclay v. Com. 25 Pa. 503, 64 Am. Dec. 715.

Where a barn was used for the feeding of cattle, and in such a manner as to render the water of a spring in near proximity thereto impure, thereby creating a nuisance, it was held that the remedy was not to tear down defendant's barn, but to prevent its use for such purposes. Barclay v. Com. 25 Pa. 503, 606, 64 Am. Dec. 715.

In New York Health Dept. v. Dassori, 21 App. Div. 348, the board of health sought to destroy the plaintiff's buildings as being a public nuisance detrimental to health, upon the ground that the bedrooms in the same had no ventilation whatever except such as they might get from living rooms, or from the window opening on an ill-smelling and narrow court; and that the buildings were occupied by school sinks, the cellars opening into a court yard with no other means of ventilation; that the same were damp and the smells from the cellars went through the whole house and were almost unendurable; the stairways being narrow and steep, always dark and foul, smoke and coal gas from defective chimney flues discoloring the walls and ceilings, the roofs leaking, the houses swarming with vermin throughout, every room being damp and filled with air foul and unfit to breathe; with no possibility of the sun shining into the building, the death rate in these buildings being considerable higher than the death rate in the ward, the infant death rate there being abnormally high, the deaths being largely caused by diseases nourished by the dampness and exposure to the foul air, which facts were entirely undisputed and unexplained. The court held that even though such facts existed, yet they did not sufficiently establish the fact that they were not capable of being made fit for habitation, or that the nuisance upon them could not be abated in any other way than by destruction, the evidence showing that the unsanitary condition of the buildings was caused to a considerable extent, if not entirely, by the filthy habits of the persons who inhabited them, and grew out of the fact that they were used for human habitation; and further, it did not appear that after the buildings had been vacated they might not easily have been put into a sanitary condition by proper repairs and the removal of the offensive apertures, and that such being the case the proper remedy was not the destruction of said buildings but the abatement of the nuisance by part of § 1 of the ordinance which declares that any building, etc., that shall be partially destroyed by fire, etc., and suffered by the owner to remain in such condition after being notified, etc., to remove, repair, etc., shall constitute a nuisance. The controlling question, therefore, for our decision is that which relates to the validity of this portion of the ordinance, for as this is the basis upon which the city's proceedings rest, its invalidity must necessarily render them inoperative and void. Counsel for appellee deny that the common council of the city of Evansville has, either expressly or impliedly, the power to declare by an ordinance that a building partially destroyed and suffered to remain in that condition shall, by reason of such facts alone, necessarily constitute a nuisance. It will be seen that the ordinance in dispute ordains that any building, etc., partially destroyed by fire, or any other cause, and suffered to remain in such condition after notice to the owner, etc., shall constitute a nuisance. The latter is declared to exist as the result of these naked facts, and authority is given to the department of public works to abate such declared nuisance, putting them in a fit condition so as to render them capable of being used for other purposes, if not as habitations, for the reason that a thing which is a nuisance because of the use to which it is put cannot be destroyed by way of abating the nuisance unless the destruction is necessary, and if the nuisance can be abated by discontinuing the use it must be abated in that way.

The court distinguished the above case of New York Health Dept. v. Dasso, 21 App. Div. 348, from the earlier case of Meeker v. Van Rensselaer, 15 Wend. 397, which has been looked upon as establishing the proposition that a building which is in a filthy condition and calculated to breed disease, thereby becoming a public nuisance, might be torn down by way of abating the nuisance; but the court stated that such latter case was decided upon the facts of that case, which made it proper that the only way of abating the nuisance was by the destruction of the building, and for that reason alone the court held the destruction of the building justifiable in that case, no such facts appearing in the case then before the court.

But in Golden v. New York Health Dept., 21 App. Div. 421, which was an appeal taken from a judgment rendered in the court below in favor of the defendants, the board of health had ordered certain buildings belonging to the plaintiff, which they alleged were not fit for human habitation by reason of defects, to be vacated and destroyed as a public nuisance, the plaintiffs contended that the defendant's orders were not conclusive of the question, and the court upheld such contention, holding that the proceedings by the board of health were reviewable by the courts, the proper protection of the rights of property owners making it necessary that they should have an opportunity to be heard in the courts as to the existence of the nuisance, upon the allegation of which the board of health practically took away the value of their property or destroyed it. In this case the court relied upon the earlier cases of People, Copcutt v. Yonkers Bd. of Health, 140 N. Y. 1, 23 L. R. A. 481; Yonkers Bd. of Health v. Copcutt, 140 N. Y. 120, 23 L. R. A. 485; New York Health Dept. v. Trinity Church, 145 N. Y. 23, 27 L. R. A. 710.

In the case of New York Health Dept. v. Weekes, 47 N. Y. Supp. 913, the health department sought to condemn certain real property under the authority of chapter 567 of the Laws of 1895, as amended by chapter 57 of the laws of 1897, which authorized the destruction of buildings which were not fit for human habitation and were incapable of being rendered so; but the question turned upon the right of review on a decision as to facts, and did not show in what way the building in question constituted a nuisance.

Again, an old building used for the storage of various articles cannot be itself declared a nuisance, torn down, and hauled away by the city as being in a dangerous situation and annoying to the public, where the public records do not show any establishment of, or that such building is within, the fire limits, or that the building has been erected since its establishment, and in violation of its order, such building being not itself a nuisance, and therefore its arbitrary destruction by the city is the violation of a right of property. Allison v. Richmond, 51 Mo. App. 133, 136.

In a case where the city authorities claimed power under their charter to remove any forge, blacksmith shop, or other structure within the city where in their opinion it was necessary so to do in order to insure against fire, also to remove any stovepipe that should endanger the city by fire, it was held that they had no power to remove the building of a blacksmith shop where there was no necessity so to do, the building itself being harmless and the sparks emitted from the forge used therein being the danger, and the court therefore condemned the removal of the building itself and confined the action of the authorities to the removal of the forge used therein. Dupree v. Brunswick, 82 Ga. 727, 729.

So, the destruction of a house as a nuisance upon the report of the building inspectors and engineer of the city, where the city charter confers authority upon the municipal authorities to act, and cause nuisances to be abated which are likely "to endanger the health of the city or of any neighborhood" only upon the report of the board of health and in pursuance of its recommendation. Frank v. Atlanta, 72 Ga. 423, 432.

Buildings in which particular trades are carried on, or houses which are kept in a disorderly manner, or used for unlawful purposes, are not nuisances per se, but it is the abuse of them which constitutes the nuisance. Miller v. Burch, 82 Tex. 208, 5 Am. Rep. 242; Burditt v. Swenson, 17 Tex. 489, 67 Am. Dec. 685; Dargan v. Waddill, 9 Ired. L. 244, 49 Am. Rep. 421; Welch v. Stowell, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 332; Czarniecki v. Bollman (Pa.) 10 Cent. Rep. 90; Hex v. Pappineau, 1 Strange, 636; Chicago v. Union Stock Yards & T. Co., 164 Ill. 224, 35 L. R. A. 281.

So, in the case of a lawful business, carried on in a certain locality, declared a nuisance by a state statute, the nuisance consists in the use of the building for the purposes of such business, and not in the location of the building itself, and it cannot be abated by the public destroying the building without making the town liable for the damages occasioned thereby. Brightman v. Bristol, 65 Me. 436, 20 Am. Rep. 711.

Although a house kept as a house of ill fame and as a resort for thieves and other disreputable people is a public and common nuisance, yet such fact will not enable the public authorities to destroy the building and its furniture in order to abate such nuisance, and such a proceeding is therefore unlawful. Ely v. Niagara County Supers. 36 N. Y. 297, 300.

But a different rule would appear to exist where the building itself is of a highly inflammable and combustible nature. See Fields v. Stuckley, 99 Pa. 306, 44 Am. Rep. 100.

And in such cases the power of the common council is limited to the prevention and suppression of the nuisances even though the ordinance declares them to be nuisances and orders their abatement. Welch v. Stowell, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 332.

sance at the expense of the owner of the property. These facts alone are the test. The ordinance erects no other standard by which the supposed nuisance is to be measured or determined. No reference or regard whatever is had as to the condition, character, situation, or surroundings, which might tend to render the buildings unsafe in any manner to the public, or a detriment to the health or inconvenience of the public. There is an entire absence of facts declared, tending to show that, if such partially destroyed building is suffered to remain, it may be productive of annoyance or injury to the public. That such a building may become a nuisance, if maintained, by reason of the ruinous and weak condition of its walls or other parts, thereby rendering them liable to fall and do injury to persons passing by, or resulting in injury to an adjoining owner, is a well-established legal proposition. It is said by an eminent author that such a building as last mentioned, on a public street, is a public nuisance, and a private nuisance to those owning property adjacent to it. Wood, Nuisance, § 109. It is evident, however, that in such a case the nuisance would consist, not

It must be an extreme case which will authorize the municipal authorities of a city to doom a house to destruction by a simple resolution declaring it to be a house of ill fame and a nuisance. Welch v. Stowell, 3 Dougl. (Mich.) 332.

And the law of necessity alone will justify the common council of a city in resorting to the destruction of property in order to suppress houses of ill fame. Welch v. Stowell, 3 Dougl. (Mich.) 332.

As to the right to interfere in the case of particular trades as nuisances, see note to Ex parte Lacey (Cal.) — L. R. A. —.

The power to destroy buildings in order to remove the danger caused by the structure itself as distinguished from its use is further treated of in the cases of wooden buildings, infra, IV., and also in cases under I., supra.

III. Over the use of buildings.

The question of municipal control over nuisances arising from particular trades will be found discussed in note to Ex parte Lacey (Cal.) — L. R. A. —.

Where the nuisance consists in the use to which the building is put, the remedy is to stop such use. Barclay v. Com. 25 Pa. 503, 505, 64 Am. Dec. 715; Nazworthy v. Sullivan, 55 Ill. App. 48, 51; Allison v. Richmond, 51 Mo. App. 133, 136; Miller v. Burch, 82 Tex. 208, 5 Am. Rep. 242; Ely v. Niagara County Supers. 36 N. Y. 297, 300; Moody v. Niagara County Supers. 46 Barb. 659; United States Illuminating Co. v. Grant, 55 Hun, 222, dictum; Welch v. Stowell, 3 Dougl. (Mich.) 332; State, Rodwell, v. Newark, 34 N. J. L. 264, 267; Dupree v. Brunswick, 82 Ga. 727; Chicago v. Union Stock Yards & T. Co. 184 Ill. 224, 35 L. R. A. 231; Czarniecki v. Bollman (Pa.) 10 Cent. Rep. 96; Reg. v. Pappineau, 1 Strange, 686; Brown v. Perkins, 12 Gray, 89, 100.

So with respect to the use to which real property may be put it is said, every holder of property, however absolute and unqualified may be his title, holds it under the implied liability that his use of it may be so regulated that it shall not be injurious to the equal enjoyment of others having an equal right to the enjoyment of their property, nor injurious to the rights of the community. McKibbin v. Fort Smith, 35 Ark. 382, 385.

The city government has the general power to so regulate the use and enjoyment of private property in the city as to prevent its proving pernicious to the citizens generally. It may, when the use to which the owner devotes his property becomes a nuisance, compel him to cease so to use it, and punish him for refusing to obey its ordinances or regulations concerning such use. Louisville City R. Co. v. Louisville, 8 Bush, 416, 422; Ashbrook v. Com. 1 Bush, 139.

And this is so for the reason that the power to interfere with the citizen in the use and enjoyment of his property is indispensable to government. Louisville City R. Co. v. Louisville, 8 Bush, 416, 422.

Police regulations which direct the use of private property so as to prevent its proving pernicious to the citizens at large, and thus becoming a nuisance, are not void although they may in some measure interfere with private rights without providing compensation. Harvey v. Dewoody, 18 Ark. 253, 259. To the same effect, Baker v. Boston, 13 Pick. 194; Vanderbilt v. Adams, 7 Cow. 349; Stuyvesant v. New York, 7 Cow. 538; State, Marshall, v. Cadwalader, 31 N. J. L. 233, 234.

The legislature may prohibit the use of land which the common law would regard as a nuisance if it endangers adjoining houses or the highway, and may authorize cities and towns by ordinances and by-laws to make similar prohibitions. Com. v. Parks, 155 Mass. 531, 532; Salem v. Maynes, 123 Mass. 372, 375; Barbier v. Connolly, 118 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 223.

Under the Pennsylvania statutes of 1849, the board of health have power "to remove the cause of all nuisances that now exist or may hereafter be created," and therefore they have power to order a lot upon which a nuisance exists to be fenced in, the absence of such fence being the reason of the nuisance, allowing persons by reason of its non-existence to deposit filth thereon. Wistar v. Addicks, 9 Phila. 145.

Where, by the city charter, all nuisances are under the supervision of the town authorities, and the act provides for a board of health whose duty it is to report all nuisances, and thereupon they are to be summarily abated, although the powers so given to the town by such charter are broader than those conferred by the Georgia general laws of 1833, yet the city authorities have full power under such charter to abate a nuisance on the report of the board of health, and therefore the abatement of a nuisance, such as a mill and machinery run by water, is valid even though nuisances of that character are provided for in the act of 1833. Montezuma v. Minor, 70 Ga. 191.

A city ordinance providing, inter alia, that the keeping or controlling of any house or building within the corporate limits of the city, where loud or unusual noises are permitted, or where persons are permitted to congregate and engage in the use of profane or vulgar language to the disturbance of others, is a common nuisance, is valid under § 456 of the Iowa Code; and as such ordinance, or the information filed thereunder, does not charge an unlawful assemblage, or the nuisance as defined by statute, the same is not void for the reason that the offense referred to therein is punishable under the laws of the state. Centerville v. Miller, 57 Iowa, 56 and 225.

Yet a trade, occupation, or establishment, or a thing useful in its character, and which in the common experience and observation of men is not a nuisance in fact, cannot be conclusively declared to be a nuisance by the council of a city. Harrison v. Lewiston, 48 Ill. App. 164, 165.

See further as to nuisances by trade or business, the note to Ex parte Lacey (Cal.) — L. R. A. —.

To make an occupation, indispensable to the health and comfort of a civilized man, and the use of property necessary to carry it on, a nuisance, by a mere arbitrary declaration in a city ordinance, and suppress it as such, are simply to confiscate property and deprive its owner of it without due process of law, and it also abridges the liberty of the owner alone in the fact that the building was one that had been partially destroyed, but in its being maintained in its unsafe or dangerous condition. It may, however, be maintained in a partially destroyed condition, and yet be harmless in all respects; the unsafe condition thereof depending upon the extent of the destruction; and another feature to be considered would be whether it was remote from a public street or passway. But the ordinance does not take into account any of these facts or features, but expressly condemns and outlaws as a nuisance the maintaining of any partially destroyed building without regard to its character as to danger by reason of its weak condition or location or surroundings. By § 23 of the act under which the city of Evansville is operating, its common council is empowered to declare what shall constitute a nuisance, and to require its abatement, and to assess the expenses of its removal against the person causing the same or suffering it to exist. Acts 1895, p. 259. But the rule is well settled that a municipal corporation, although empowered by law to declare what shall constitute a nuisance, may not declare that to be one which in to select his own occupation and his own methods in the pursuit of happiness, and prevents him from enjoying his rights, privileges, and immunities, and deprives him of the equal protection of the laws secured to every person by the United States Constitution. Re Sam Kee, 81 Fed. Rep. 680.

So, the particular use of property declared a nuisance by an ordinance of a municipal corporation does not make such use a nuisance, unless it be so in fact according to the common-law or statutory definition of a nuisance. State v. Mott, 61 Md. 297, 48 Am. Rep. 105, 107.

And a law or ordinance which denies to the owner of property the right to conduct thereon a lawful business is invalid unless the business to which it relates is of such a noxious or offensive character that the health, safety, or comfort of the surrounding community requires its exclusion from that particular locality. Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 83, 19 L. R. A. 727.

The power to prevent nuisances does not directly or by implication carry with it the authority to hold the owner of a building, who may never himself visit it, responsible for the nuisance of keeping a house of ill fame, committed by his tenant without his knowledge or consent, and such a by-law is not only unauthorized but unreasonable. State v. Webber, 107 N. C. 963, 966.

An ordinance passed or amended after a decision prohibiting the erection of a wheel, such as the Ferris wheel, in a special locality, which prohibits the operation of such a wheel within a district created especially to include such locality, is not in any sense a regulation, but is an attempt at prohibition, which is an unlawful interference with the right to use private property, when such creates neither a private nor a public nuisance, nor is a nuisance per se, nor even a public nuisance with which the municipal authorities have power to interfere. Ferris Wheel Co. v. Chicago, 27 Chicago Legal News, 869.

A city cannot by ordinance, whatever its provisions, recover a penalty of an individual for keeping within the city limits articles of property which otherwise might be owned and kept, merely because they emit a disagreeable odor, the same not being a nuisance per se. Lippman v. South Bond, 84 Ind. 276, 279.

A city ordinance passed for the purpose of regulating the building and conducting of private hospitals within the city limits is not within the provisions of a statute incorporating a town which empowers the city authorities to enforce ordinances to erect and establish, inter alia, hospitals, hospitals therein referred to being public and not private; neither is such an ordinance valid as coming within the general power of a city over the public welfare and for the abatement of nuisance; neither is it a proper exercise of the implied powers of a city. Bessones v. Indianapolis, 71 Ind. 189, 195.

Hospitals and homes for the sick are not nuisances per se. Bessones v. Indianapolis, 71 Ind. 189, 195.

An asylum for the treatment of mild cases of insanity will not render the occupation of dwellings or schools in its neighborhood uncomfortable to such a degree that its maintenance would be deemed a nuisance, or any impairment of the substantial rights of the occupants of such dwellings or schools. Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 83, 19 L. R. A. 727.

Such an asylum for the treatment of mild forms of insanity is not like a private asylum for the confinement of dangerous lunatics, or a hospital for the treatment of loathsome or contagious diseases, and the reasons which make it necessary and proper to exclude from the thickly settled portions of cities and towns slaughterhouses, soap factories, tanneries with their offensive smells, magazines for the storing of powder, and powder mills with their attendant dangers, or any business or occupation which seriously interferes with the health or comfort of others, if permitted in such localities, do not apply to a hospital whose inmates are harmless, even though insane. Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 83, 19 L. R. A. 727.

The fact that a stock-yard company in operating a railroad through a city creates a nuisance by the transportation of live stock or substances injurious to the health and general welfare of the community does not justify the city in removing its tracks from the streets as the easiest way of abating the nuisance, to the destruction of the value of the entire road,—especially where it is authorized by its charter to transport between railroads freight and property of every kind, inasmuch as the unlawful use may be prevented without destroying the structure which has been lawfully erected. Chicago v. Union Stock Yards & T. Co. 164 Ill. 234, 85 L. R. A. 231.

IV. Wooden and frame buildings.
The power of a municipal corporation to regulate or restrain the erection of wooden or frame buildings within its limits or within specified districts has, in many cases, been upheld as a valid exercise of the police power, although the provisions of the city ordinance upon the subject have not expressly declared such buildings to be nuisances. The following cases support this power: Montgomery v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 84 Ala. 127; Canepa v. Birmingham, 92 Ala. 368; McCloskey v. Kreling, 78 Cal. 511; Ex parte Fiske, 72 Cal. 125; Re Yick Wo, 68 Cal. 204, 207, 58 Am. Rep. 12; Daggett v. State, 4 Conn. 60, 10 Am. Dec. 100; Tuttle v. State, 4 Conn. 68; Townsend v. Hoadley, 12 Conn. 541; Brown v. Hunn, 27 Conn. 382, 71 Am. Dec. 71; Welch v. Hotchkiss, 39 Conn. 140, 12 Am. Rep. 383; Stamford v. Studwell, 60 Conn. 85; Des Moines v. Gilchrist, 67 Iowa, 210, 56 Am. Rep. 341; Keokuk v. Scroggs, 89 Iowa, 447; State v. Schuchardt, 42 La. Ann. 49; State v. O'Neill, 49 La. Ann. 1171; Com. v. Tewksbury, 11 Met. 55, 58; Coffin v. Nantucket, 5 Cush. 299; Cordes v. Miller, 39 Mich. 581, 38 Am. Rep. 430; Hines v. Charlotte, 72 Mich. 278; Alexander v. Greenville, 54 Miss. 669; Eichlenlaub v. St. Joseph, 113 Mo. 395, 18 L. R. A. 590; State, Thompson, v. Kearney, 25 Neb. 262; Stilwell v. Buffalo Riding Academy, 21 Abb. N. fact is not. First Nat. Bank v. Sarile, 129 Ind. 201, 13 L. R. A. 481, and authorities there cited; Baumgartner v. Hasty, 100 Ind. 575, 50 Am. Rep. 830; Des Plaines v. Poyer, 123 Ill. 848; Denter v. Mullen, 7 Colo. 345; Erevelt v. Council Bluffs, 46 Iowa, 68; Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 984; Tiedeman, Pol. Power, § 122; Wood, Nuisances, §§ 742-744; Lippman v. South Bend, 84 Ind. 276; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 874; State v. Jersey City, 29 N. J. L. 170; Beach, Pub. Corp. §§ 1026, 1029, 1031.

In Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall.

497, 19 L. ed. 984, the Supreme Court of the United States, in considering the power conferred upon the city of Milwaukee to declare what shall constitute a nuisance, per Justice Miller, said: "It is a doctrine not to be tolerated in this country, that a municipal corporation, without any general laws, either of the city or of the state, within which a given structure can be shown to be a nuisance, can, by its mere declaration that it is one, subject it to removal by any person supposed to be aggrieved, or even by the city itself. This would place every house, every business, and all the property

v. Buffum, 2 E. D. Smith, 511; New York Fire Dept. v. Buhler, 35 N. Y. 177; Ogden v. Welden, 40 N. Y. 8, R. 235; Cleveland v. Lenze, 27 Ohio St. 333; Hubbard v. Medford, 20 Or. 315; Hortman v. Young, 18 Phila. 19; Aldrich v. Howard, 7 R. I. 199; Olympia v. Mann, 1 Wash. 839, 12 L. R. A. 155; Carroll v. Lynchburg, 84 Va. 803.

But in Kneedler v. Norristown, 100 Pa. 363, 45 Am. Rep. 384, the power of the borough to prohibit the erection of frame buildings within the limits of the city was denied, the charter of the borough containing no authority to enact ordinances prohibiting the erection of such buildings, the grant of the general power conferred upon the borough containing nothing from which an authority can be necessarily inferred or to which it is indispensable.

Again, under an act authorizing the corporation to pass by-laws to prevent the erection of wooden buildings within such parts of the city as the corporation may define, a by-law of the city council defining fire limits and prohibiting the erection of any building within such limits other than of stone, brick, iron, or other material of an incombustible nature is declared void, in Atty. Gen. v. Campbell, 19 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 299.

And so, a by-law of a city passed under Ontario Rev. Stat. chap. 174, § 467, subsec. 6, which defines fire limits and describes the manner in which buildings are to be erected, and also restricts the relaying or recovering the roof of existing buildings, except in the manner prescribed by such ordinance, is held to be ultra vires so far as it relates to existing buildings. Reg. v. Howard, 4 Ont. Rep. 377.

So, it has been said that while the legislative power to authorize the prohibition of the erection of wooden buildings may be conceded, yet the nature of the power is so high, and the subjects themselves so various, that it is not naturally embraced in the subordinate power to declare and abate nuisances, fire limits having been generally treated as distinct and provided for by separate and distinct grants of power under the Texas laws. Pye v. Peterson, 45 Tex. 512, 23 Am. Rep. 608.

Yet, on the other hand, it has been stated that under the general welfare clause found in the charters of municipal corporations such bodies may regulate, inter alia, the manner of constructing buildings, the places where wooden buildings may be built, and may also prohibit the storage of inflammable substances in insecure structures. Clark v. South Bend, 85 Ind. 276, 278, 44 Am. Rep. 13, 15; Williams v. Augusta, 4 Ga. 509; Frederick v. Augusta, 5 Ga. 561; Charleston v. Elford, 1 McMill. L. 234; Brady v. North Western Ins. Co. 11 Mich. 425; Douglass v. Com. 2 Rawle, 232; Wadleigh v. Gilman, 12 Me. 403, 28 Am. Dec. 183; Vanderbilt v. Adams, 17 Cow. 349; Monroe v. Hoffman, 29 La. Ann. 651, 652, 29 Am. Rep. 345, 346.

Such a right must exist ex necessitate, without special legislative authority, upon the principles of the maxim sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas. Monroe v. Hoffman, 29 La. Ann. 651, 656, 29 Am. Rep. 345, 346.

In Hawley v. Harrell, 19 Conn. 142, the power of the local authorities to remove wooden buildings from the streets as an obstruction and nuisance preventing street improvements, especially after notice to the owner, was upheld.

And again, in Cheek v. Aurora, 92 Ind. 107, 112, 113, the same power was upheld where such buildings had become nuisances as obstructing the streets.

So, with respect to the right of a municipal corporation to destroy buildings in order to prevent the spreading of fire, this is generally held to be a valid exercise of the police power, although the ordinance granting such power may not have placed the same upon the ground of nuisance. Coffin v. Nantucket, 5 Cush. 269; Russell v. New York, 2 Denio, 461; People v. Brisbane, 76 N. Y. 553, 32 Am. Rep. 337; New York v. Lord, 17 Wend. 285, 18 Wend. 126; Stone v. New York, 25 Wend. 157; White v. Charleston, 2 Hill, L. 571; Keller v. Corpus Christi, 60 Tex. 614, 32 Am. Rep. 613; Field v. Des Moines, 39 Iowa, 575, 18 Am. Rep. 46.

In many cases, however, it has been sought to declare the erection of wooden or frame buildings contrary to the provisions of the city ordinance a nuisance, and the following cases show the light in which the courts have regarded this subject.

As in other cases involving the question of municipal control over nuisances, the authorities can exercise only such powers as are expressly or impliedly conferred by their charter, such powers being strictly construed, the restrictions placed upon such buildings being regarded as invasions of private rights. Keokuk v. Scroggs, 39 Iowa, 447; Pratt v. Litchfield, 62 Conn. 112, 113; Booth v. State, 4 Conn. 63.

A wooden building, though erected contrary to law, is not per se a public nuisance, although it may become such by the manner in which it is used or allowed to be used. Fields v. Stokley, 90 Pa. 206, 44 Am. Rep. 109.

And the erection of a wooden building within the limits of a city or village is not in and of itself a nuisance; neither does the fact that such erection is prohibited by ordinance make it a nuisance. St. Johns v. McFarlan, 33 Mich. 72, 20 Am. Rep. 671.

Again, such a building, not being a nuisance per se, cannot, when erected, be abated by ordinance as being within fire limits afterwards established. Allison v. Richmond, 51 Mo. App. 133, 136; Wadleigh v. Gilman, 12 Me. 403, 28 Am. Dec. 183; Klingler v. Bickel, 117 Pa. 333.

Neither in its legal or general meaning does the word "nuisance" apply to wooden buildings either in cities or towns, and their erection and occupation are an ordinary exercise of property right, and do not fall within the definition of a nuisance at common law. Pye v. Peterson, 45 Tex. 512, 23 Am. Rep. 608. Here the nuisances sought to be suppressed was wooden buildings erected within certain fire limits established by the municipality.

But when a wooden building is erected in a place prohibited by law, and where it endangers the safety of adjoining property, it may become a nuisance, and if the locality and character of such a of the city, at the uncontrolled will of the temporary local authorities." In the case of Lake View v. Letz, 44 Ill. 81, it is said: "There are some things which in their nature are nuisances, and which the law recognizes as such. There are others which may or may not be so, their character in this respect depending on circumstances." In Tiedeman, Pol Power, 122a, it is said: "A certain use of lands, harmless in itself, does not become a nuisance, because the legislature has declared it to be so." In Denver v. Mullen, 7 Colo. 345, the supreme court of Colorado, in construing a provision in the charter of the city of Denver conferring authority upon its council to declare what shall be a nuisance, and to prevent and abate the same, held that such conferred power did not authorize the council to arbitrarily declare any particular thing a nuisance which had not theretofore been pronounced such by law, or so adjudged by a judicial determination. In the course of the opinion, on page 353, 7 Colo., the court said: "The proper construction of this language is that the city is clothed with authority to declare, by general ordinance, what shall constitute a nuisance. That is to building endanger the safety of surrounding buildings it may be treated as a nuisance, and a governmental body having authority to legislate upon such subjects may prohibit its erection in places where it would endanger the safety of surrounding property. Baumgartner v. Hasty, 100 Ind. 575, 578, 50 Am. Rep. 830.

Municipal corporations, pursuant to the powers conferred upon them, may remove or compel the removal of wooden buildings erected in violation of a valid ordinance; not necessarily because the building thus erected is a nuisance, but because its erection is a violation of the ordinance and in defiance of the law. First Nat. Bank v. Sarlis, 129 Ind. 201, 18 L. R. A. 481.

An ordinance prohibiting the erection of wooden buildings within the city limits was upheld in Easton Comra. v. Covey, 74 Md. 262, as within the general powers conferred by the city charter, and not limited or qualified by the subsequent special grants of power, such as the abatement of nuisances, such ordinance not being unreasonable but useful and essential to the welfare and prosperity of the town.

Where the act of incorporation declared that buildings already erected within the original plan of the street should not be considered nuisances, but that new buildings erected in place thereof, owing to decay, etc., should not be built on such streets, and if so built should be considered nuisances, the action of the public authorities in abating the erection of the defendant's new building in place of his old one was justified, such erection being subsequent to the passing of the charter. Com. v. McDonald, 16 Serg. & R. 890; Arundel v. McCulloch, 10 Mass. 70.

So, where a valid municipal ordinance prohibits the location of wooden buildings within certain limits, and the building is located within the prohibited district and endangers the safety of surrounding property, it may properly be treated as a public nuisance, and as such abated. Baumgartner v. Hasty, 100 Ind. 575, 578, 50 Am. Rep. 830.

And it has been said that every frame building erected in a closely built portion of a town in violation of a lawful ordinance prohibiting it may be said to be a nuisance owing to the danger from fire, although it is not such a nuisance per se as will justify a private person in abating it. Klingler v. Bickel, 117 Pa. 323, 339.

Laws having for their object the protection of property from fire and the health of the community in densely populated cities must, from necessity, be promptly and arbitrarily enforced, and therefore a summary procedure, for the abatement of a nuisance under an ordinance making wooden buildings a nuisance, and establishing the fire limits of the city, on behalf of the municipal authorities, is a proper exercise of power, such an ordinance being essential to the protection of the city. Hine v. New Haven, 40 Conn. 478.

Yet the governmental authorities of a locality must determine in what places wooden buildings shall not be erected, for courts cannot exercise legislative functions in such matters, and for them 38 L. R. A.

to undertake to prescribe such localities would be to usurp governmental powers which rest in the local authorities. Baumgartner v. Hasty, 100 Ind. 575, 578, 50 Am. Rep. 830.

An ordinance, passed pursuant to the powers of a charter, establishing a fire district, defining the limits thereof, and prohibiting the erection, enlargement, or elevation of any wooden building of any kind within such district, authorizing the removal thereof and declaring the same a common nuisance abatable by any person, or the mayor, or the chief engineer of the fire department, or the fire marshal of a city, with the advice of the mayor after giving reasonable notice, is reasonable and valid, and the court will refuse to grant an injunction staying the abatement of such nuisance. Hine v. New Haven, 40 Conn. 478.

So, under a city charter giving the mayor and common council "power to abate nuisances public or private, and to pass all ordinances they may deem necessary for preserving the health, peace, good order, and good government of the city, and to enforce all ordinances by them adopted not inconsistent with the laws of this state," an ordinance forbidding the erection of wooden or frame buildings on certain streets and giving power for the marshal to remove the same is valid and within the provisions of the charter. Ford v. Thrakill, 84 Ga. 169, 170.

And an ordinance providing that all steam grist mills, saw mills, and other machinery run by steam, contained or operated in buildings or structures wholly or partially of wood, which by reason of defects or dilapidations in the same, or in the machinery, or boiler, or from any other cause, are dangerous to persons or property, shall be considered a nuisance, is a valid exercise of police power and within a charter giving power to regulate and prevent dangerous manufactures as causing or promoting fires, and to prevent nuisances. Green v. Lake, 60 Miss. 451.

So, if the structure or building in which a laundry business is carried on is by its structure, form, or material unsafe, the public authorities may, by proper proceedings, have it altered or removed, such power being possessed with reference to all vocations and buildings in which they are prosecuted. Laundry Ordinance Case, 7 Sawy. 526, 13 Fed. Rep. 229, 231.

The business of a laundry, although not opposed to good morals or subversive of public order or decency, may when conducted in certain localities be highly dangerous to the public safety so as to require its regulation by terms of a city ordinance. Re Yick Wo, 68 Cal. 294, 58 Am. Rep. 12.

Upon appeal, the decision in this case was reversed, on the ground that the ordinance prohibiting such a business in wooden buildings within a certain part of the city without the consent of a board of supervisors, and providing that it should be unlawful for any person to engage in the laundry business within the corporate limits "without having first obtained the consent of the board of supervisors, except the same be located in a building constructed either of brick or stone," did not say, the city may, by such ordinance, define, classify, and enact what things or classes of things, and under what conditions and circumstances such specified things, are to constitute and be deemed nuisances. For instance, the city might, under such authority, declare by ordinance that slaughter houses within the limits of the city, carcasses of dead animals left lying within the city, goods, boxes, and the like, piled up or remaining for a certain length of time on the sidewalks, or other things injurious to health or causing obstruction or danger to the public in the use of the streets and sidewalks, should be deemed nuisances; not that the city council may, by a mere resolution or motion, declare any particular thing a nuisance which has not theretofore been pronounced to be such by law, or so adjudged by judicial determination." We think it is clear under the authorities that the common council, by the ordinance in controversy, attempted to declare that a nuisance which in fact under the law cannot be so considered, and therefore transcended the power with which it was invested. As ascertained by the authorities it would be a dangerous doctrine, and fraught with much prescribe a rule and conditions for the regulation of the use of laundry property, to which all similarly situated might conform, but conferred a naked arbitrary power upon the board to give or withhold consent, and made all engaged in the business the tenants at will as to their means of living under the board of supervisors. Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 30 L. ed. 220.

A similar ordinance was upheld in King v. Daventport, 98 Ill. 805, 38 Am. Rep. 89, where the city had power by ordinance to establish fire limits and to declare the building or repairing of buildings with combustible materials within the fire limits a nuisance, the ordinance establishing such fire limits, and enacting that any building built or repaired with other than fire-proof material, or any roof or gutter placed on any building the outer surface of which was made with materials other than fire proof within the fire limits, without permission, should be deemed a nuisance, the city marshal upon the written authority of the mayor having power to remove or tear down such building in cases where the offender after reasonable notice failed to remove the building.

Again, if by the terms of a city ordinance the city is empowered to inflict a fine upon a person erecting wooden buildings within the limits of the city, contrary to the terms of the ordinance, such power is not the only one which the city has, and it is lawful for it to remove such buildings in order to protect the public from the hazardous consequences of a continuance of such combustible matter in a dangerous position. Wadleigh v. Gilman, 12 Me. 403, 28 Am. Dec. 188, 189.

Where, however, the village ordinance establishing fire limits prohibits the erection or repair of any wooden building within the prescribed limits without permission, and provides that any building standing, fronting, or cornering on the public square, becoming damaged by fire, decay, or otherwise, to the extent of 50 per cent of its value, shall be deemed and declared to be a nuisance, it is held that before the city authorities can proceed in a summary manner to tear down or abate such nuisance they must first notify the owner to remove the same in the manner provided by the ordinance. Louisville v. Webster, 108 Ill. 414.

So, where a valid municipal ordinance prohibits the location of wooden buildings within certain limits, and the building is located within the prohibited district and endangers the safety of surrounding property, it is properly treated as a public nuisance and as such abated. Baumgartner v. Hasty, 100 Ind. 575, 576, 50 Am. Rep. 830.

And the action of the common council of a city in destroying a house as a nuisance by reason of its endangering the town by fire was upheld in Harvey v. Dewoody, 18 Ark. 252, the owner having neglected or refused to comply with the notice of the council.

When the power over wooden buildings is expressly given by the city charter, the court will enforce and uphold the proceedings of such authorities thereunder so long as they are within the lines pointed out by such charter or necessarily implied 33 L. R. A.

from the act of incorporation. Troy v. Winters, 4 Thomp. & C. 256.

The above case was distinguished from that of Hudson v. Thorne, 7 Paige, 261, upon the ground that in that case the court refused to enjoin the erection of the wooden buildings, the same not being a public nuisance, the action not being based upon an ordinance giving power over such buildings.

An ordinance establishing and extending fire limits, so as to include the defendant's contemplated wooden buildings, to restrain which, as a public nuisance, an action was brought previously to the passing thereof, was upheld in Knoxville v. Bird, 12 Lea, 121, 47 Am. Rep. 326, although the action was not discontinued until after it was passed, and it was alleged that it was really procured for the benefit of those specially affected by the alleged nuisance.

And an ordinance making wooden buildings erected within the fire limits nuisances, and enacting that they be pulled down and abated as such, is within the terms of a charter prohibiting the erection of such buildings within the defined limits. Baxter v. Seattle, 3 Wash. 352.

So, ordinances preventing the erection or construction of wooden buildings, and regulating the building of such houses, etc., within the city limits, being for the public safety and benefit, have been upheld when they have not exceeded the powers given to municipalities by their charter or the general state law, or when they are fairly and necessarily implied or are essential for the purposes of such corporations, although not expressly declared nuisances. Charleston v. Reed, 27 W. Va. 651, 55 Am. Rep. 836.

And an ordinance establishing fire limits and prohibiting the erection or reconstruction of wooden or frame buildings within the city limits was upheld in Brady v. North Western Ins. Co. 11 Mich. 426, the common council having power to pass such laws, not contrary to the Constitution, as are a proper exercise of police power necessary to the safety of the city, and such ordinance is no condemnation of property to public use. An ordinance passed under the Pennsylvania laws of April 18, 1795, prohibiting the erection of wooden buildings in certain parts of the city, was upheld as preventing damage and the maintaining of a public nuisance. Respublica v. Duquet, 2 Yeates, 493.

The elevation and enlargement of a wooden building is an erection within the meaning of an ordinance prohibiting the erection of wooden buildings. Douglass v. Com. 2 Rawle, 262.

And with respect to the power of municipal authorities to prevent the spreading of fire, the legislature, in the exercise of its police power and for the protection of persons and property against the dangers of fire, may authorize cities and towns by ordinance and by-laws to restrict or prohibit the erection of wooden buildings within the municipality, or within any district thereof, and therefore a city ordinance passed pursuant to Mass. Stat. 1872, chap. 243 (13 of which provides for their removal and abatement as nuisances), which prohibevil, to recognize the authority of a municipal legislature to declare that a nuisance which its own caprice might deem proper to outlaw as such. Even though such power is expressly conferred by the legislature, it is utterly inoperative, unless the thing so declared to be a nuisance is one in fact, or was created or erected after the adoption of the ordinance, and in defiance thereof. Wood, Nuisances, § 744. What the legislature cannot do directly in this respect it cannot authorize a municipal corporation to do. Without further extending this opinion, we are, under the authorities cited, constrained to hold that the part of § 1 of the ordinance as indicated by the italics is void for the reasons herein stated, and the proceedings thereunder by the city, involved in the case at bar, consequently cannot be maintained.

Judgment affirmed.

its the erection of wooden buildings within a certain district and within a certain distance apart, is a valid exercise of police power. Salem v. Maynes, 123 Mass. 372.

So, the action of the mayor of a city in destroying certain wooden buildings or houses composed wholly of highly inflammable and combustible materials, and used night and day by drunken and disorderly persons in such a manner that the lives, health, and property of the citizens are greatly endangered and the public safety imperiled, will be upheld on the ground that such buildings, although not of themselves a nuisance per se, are such by reason of the manner in which they are used, or allowed to be used. Fields v. Stokley, 99 Pa. 303, 44 Am. Rep. 109.

And the court will uphold a borough ordinance which prohibits the erection of wooden buildings within a certain district, the same having been found by the jury to constitute a public nuisance. Klingler v. Bickel, 117 Pa. 323, 339.

So, in Aronheimer v. Stokley, 11 Phila. 283, the court refused to restrain the action of the mayor in tearing down the plaintiff's sheds and wooden buildings erected contrary to the provisions of the city ordinance, although there was no statute or ordinance clothing the mayor with the power to summarily adjudge such buildings nuisances, and to proceed to abate them by tearing them down.

And a city ordinance declaring buildings erected within fire limits, thereby established, contrary to the provisions of such ordinance, and a nuisance was upheld, although it provided for its summary removal by the authorities. McKibbin v. Fort Smith, 35 Ark. 352.

But where the terms of the city ordinance passed for the purposes of the prevention of fire and the preservation of life are broader than the provisions contained in Mass. Stat. 1872, chap. 243, relating to nuisances (Pub. Stat. chap. 104, § 1), such ordinance is invalid. Newton v. Belger, 143 Mass. 598. The above case is distinguishable from that of Salem v. Maynes, 123 Mass. 372, which upheld a city ordinance and the constitutionality of such act, upon that ground.

And where the charter authorizes the city to ordain and establish such acts, laws, regulations, and ordinances, not inconsistent with the Constitution or laws of the state, as shall be needful for the government, order, and welfare of such body, an ordinance of a city, establishing fire limits, and declaring wooden buildings erected within such limits to be nuisances, is invalid, no express power being conferred by either the charter or by statute to establish such limits and to declare such buildings nuisances, the clause in the charter not conferring power upon the city to abate and remove nuisances. Pye v. Peterson, 45 Tex. 312, 23 Am. Rep. 608.

So, where, outside of the village ordinance, the erection of a wooden building within a specified area is not a nuisance per se the court will refuse an injunction to restrain the erection of such building. Waupun v. Moore, 34 Wis. 450, 17 Am. Rep. 446.

Where the building which the defendant sought to repair has existed for years, and the proposed alteration and repairing of the same do not create a nuisance in fact or occasion irreparable mischief or injury, and the case does not show that the proposed change either increases or diminishes the danger of fire, relief in equity will be denied. Manchester v. Smyth, 64 N. H. 380.

And the fact that the defendant erected a building partly of brick and partly of wood does not bring him within the terms of an ordinance of a municipality prohibiting the erection of wooden buildings within certain parts of a city, and thereby occasioning damage and creating a common nuisance. Stewart v. Com. 10 Watts. 307.

In Hudson v. Thorne, 7 Paige, 261, the city charter contained no power whereby the authorities could prohibit the erection of wooden buildings, and as it was not alleged in the bill that the building was a nuisance, the court refused to enjoin its erection and use for the purpose of the manufacture of compressed hay.

By the charter of the city of Buffalo, every building erected or placed contrary to any ordinance passed on by the provisions thereof is to be deemed a common nuisance and may be abated as such, and by the city ordinance persons are prohibited from erecting, placing, or moving any building, constructed in whole or in part of wood, wholly within the limits of the city as defined by the charter, without the permission of the common council. Where, therefore, the defendant had obtained the permission of the council to the erection of his building, and before the same was completed the common council sought to revoke the license and abate the erection as a nuisance, the court stated that the ordinance referred only to buildings which should be erected in the future and not to existing buildings or those erected by the permit of the council, so that neither the charter nor the ordinance authorized the city to interfere with existing buildings or those constructed by its permission, and therefore the authorities had no power to deprive the defendant of any vested rights in the building by rescinding its permit after the building was partially constructed, the general entry upon the construction of the building being sufficient to give him a vested right. Buffalo v. Chadesayne, 134 N. Y. 163, 168.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT (In Banc.).

Mary A. LIVINGSTON

SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY.

(117 Cal. 638.)

1. An order to compel a woman to support her husband out of her separate property when she is required to do so by Civ. Code, § 176, can be made by a court of equity in the exercise of its general powers without any express provision of the statute therefor, since the legal remedy, if any, is inadequate.
2. The obligation of a wife to pay money for the support of her husband under an order of court in a case within Civ. Code, § 176, is not a debt within the provisions of the Constitution against imprisonment for debt.

(August 5, 1897.)

PETITION to have an order of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt for failure to pay money toward the support of her husband adjudged void. Order affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. H. Johnson and Edward W. Fory for petitioner.

Temple, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is sought in this proceeding to have reviewed and declared void an order made by the above court adjudging that the petitioner was guilty of a contempt, and ordering her to be punished therefor. The contempt order was made in a proceeding instituted by the husband of the petitioner, under § 176 of the Civil Code, to compel her to support him out of her separate property. He obtained an order requiring her to pay for his support $24 per month. An injunction was issued, enjoining her from conveying her property so as to defeat any judgment he might obtain against her. In violation of this injunction, petitioner conveyed all her property to her daughter on the day the decree was made. At the hearing in the superior court, petitioner presented her affidavit showing that she had no means from which to make the payment. Upon this question the court found against her, and with that issue we have no concern in this proceeding. The attack made here is solely upon the power of the superior court to make such an order on any state of facts. This contention seems to be based upon the fact that, in § 137 of the Civil Code, provision is made for compelling the husband to support the wife, and it is provided that the final judgment in such case may be enforced by the court "by such order or orders as in its discretion it may from time to time deem necessary." This, it is said, authorizes such procedure when the wife is suing her husband for separate maintenance, but the statute does not authorize such orders when the husband sues the wife for his support. In Galland v. Galland, 38 Cal. 265, this court said: It is within the general powers of courts of equity, independent of the statute, to decree alimony to the wife, without divorce. The question has been variously decided in the United States, and it is said that in England courts of equity do not give such relief except as an incident in an action seeking some other redress. It is said in 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1422, that, to the question whether courts of equity have general authority to decree alimony to the wife when she is left without other means of maintenance, "it can scarcely be said that according to the result of the authorities an answer in the affirmative can be given in positive terms." This jurist further says, however (§ 1423a), that a broader jurisdiction over the matter has been asserted by some of our courts of equity, and it has been held that "a court of equity may in all cases decree her a suitable maintenance and support out of his estate, upon the very ground that there is no adequate or sufficient remedy at law in such a case. And there is so much good sense and reason in this doctrine that it might be wished it were generally adopted." The question has been much discussed, and in many cases is very fully and elaborately considered. Among these cases, Garland v. Garland, 50 Miss. 694, contains an able review of the English cases, and shows that even there some cases support the jurisdiction. Prather v. Prather, 4 DeSauss. Eq. 83, contains another thorough discussion of the question, and upon principle and authority the jurisdiction of courts of equity to decree alimony is maintained. A later case in which the same doctrine is held is Milliron v. Milliron (S. D.) 68 N. W. 286. Such being the state of the authorities, there is no reason why we should not adhere to the doctrine announced in Galland v. Galland. It is in accord with the general principle that where a right exists, and there is no adequate legal remedy, equity will take jurisdiction. If, independently of any statute, courts of equity had jurisdiction to decree alimony to a wife, although no divorce was sought, it would necessarily follow that they have jurisdiction when the husband applies for support from the wife. In each case the right comes from the same source,—the obligations assumed by the marriage, as expressed in § 155 of the Civil Code: "Husband and wife contract towards each other obligations of mutual respect, fidelity, and support." Primarily the husband is the bread winner, and assumes the responsibility for the support of the family, and he becomes the owner of the marital accumulations. But in the exceptional case provided for § 176 of the Civil Code the burden of maintenance shifts to the wife. It is an obligation of the same kind, however, as that which ordinarily rests upon the husband, and the legal remedy, if it can be said that there is any, is as inadequate in the one case as in the other.

It has been held that the obligation to pay alimony is not a debt, within the provisions of the Constitution against imprisonment for debt. Ex parte Perkins, 18 Cal. 60; Sharon v. Sharon, 67 Cal. 183. The power of the court to enforce payment of an allowance by proceedings in contempt cannot be doubted, and in Smith v. Smith, 113 Cal. 268, this court sustained the authority of the superior court to change a final decree for permanent maintenance of the wife after it had been entered, and then to enforce it by the process of contempt. But I think the order complained of cannot be considered an order changing or modifying the final decree. The petitioner was already in contempt for disobeying the lawful order of the court, and the subsequent proceedings were simply to ascertain if her failure to obey was contumacious. The obligation to pay not being a debt, I see no inability on the part of the court to provide a remedy which shall be adequate. It is said the remedy of the husband must be by an ordinary action. Counsel have not pointed out by what ordinary action the obligation could be enforced, and I know of none. In what action at law could the court ascertain and determine what monthly allowance should be made for the future support of the husband, and enter a judgment awarding an execution each month for the amount? If such a thing could be done, the remedy would not be adequate. A defendant who, in defiance of the injunction of the court, transferred her property to put it beyond the reach of an execution, would easily so delay the collection as to render the relief of no avail. An action by the administrator of the husband for damages for permitting him to starve, in violation of her duty, is not a support for the husband.

The order is affirmed.

The highest moment and importance to the public welfare, even where public policy is in question, is the observance of good faith among parties, and the upholding of private contracts, and enforcing their obligations.

Even if the original agreement for the transfer of the stock between appellant and respondent had been an illegal one, appellant is entitled to recover because resort is had to such contract only incidentally, as one of the elements going to determine the fraud of which the respondent has been guilty, and there is no rule of law which precludes the resort, even to an illegal contract, for a purpose so purely incidental.

Messrs Chickering, Thomas, & Gregory and Gerstle & Sloss, for respondents:

The contract set forth in the complaint is against public morals and against public policy, and therefore void. The court must leave both parties in exactly the position in which it finds them, and enforce the rights of neither.

The objection is one which may be taken for the first time in this court.

Garoutte, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By this action it is asked that a certain 400 shares of stock of the Alaska Commercial Company be declared to be held in trust by defendant for the benefit of plaintiff, and that an accounting be had of the earnings of said stock while so held by defendant. Defendant set up title to the stock in himself. Plaintiff offered evidence in support of his case, and upon motion was nonsuited. He moved for a new trial, which motion was denied, and thereupon appealed to this court from the judgment and order denying his motion. The motion for the nonsuit was based upon five distinct and separate grounds, and it was granted by the trial court solely upon the fourth ground. In view of the law that, if any of the grounds upon which the motion was based justified the action of the trial court, then the order of said court will be affirmed upon appeal, appellant's counsel, in their brief, have reviewed and discussed these grounds seriatim in detail. In reply, respondent's counsel, for the purpose of sustaining the action of the trial court in granting the nonsuit, have limited themselves to the fourth and fifth grounds stated in the motion. For these reasons this court will likewise limit its consideration to those grounds, deeming respondent's present position a waiver of the remaining grounds insisted upon at the hearing of the motion before the lower court.

The trial court granted the nonsuit upon the fourth ground, namely, that the action was one which attempted to enforce a contract that was against sound morals and public policy. The pith of the action disclosed by the complaint as bearing upon this particular question of morals and public policy may be stated substantially in a few words. Defendant, Sloss, was president of the Alaska Commercial Company, a corporation engaged in the sealing industry in and about the territory of Alaska. It held certain leases from the government of the United States and also that of Russia. Plaintiff was a stockholder in this corporation. These leases were soon to expire, and renewal of them was greatly desired by the corporation. Defendant, as president of the corporation, was actually engaged in the effort to secure such renewals. He represented to plaintiff "that in order to obtain such new leases, or any or either of them, it would be necessary for him (the defendant) to be in such a position as to enable him to interest certain persons high in authority and influence in the respective undertakings and with the respective governments aforesaid; that all of the members of said company should be willing to make some sacrifices to that end; that, in order to place the defendant in a position to interest certain persons high in authority and influence in the said respective undertakings, and that to successfully negotiate the obtaining of the said new leases respectively, it would be indispensable for him (the said defendant) to have a certain amount of stock of the old company at his disposal, to be used by him in and about the procuring of the said new leases; and that said negotiations could not be successfully conducted by the defendant unless he had the said shares of stock at his disposal, to be used in the manner hereinbefore stated. The said defendant then requested of the plaintiff that he (plaintiff) should transfer to the defendant 400 shares of the capital stock of said company (out of the 1,400 shares so owned by plaintiff as aforesaid), and represented, promised, and agreed to plaintiff that he (the defendant) would use the said shares of stock so placed at his disposal by plaintiff as aforesaid in the course of said negotiations looking towards the obtaining of the new leases, respectively, and for the purpose of influencing certain persons high in authority and influence with reference to the government of the United States and that of Russia, respectively, whose good offices it would be necessary to obtain to that end." The plaintiff believed these statements of the defendant, and relying upon them, transferred to him 400 shares of said stock to be used for the purposes aforesaid. The complaint further alleges that this stock was thereupon converted by defendant to his own use. As tending to show a contract against good morals and public policy, after a careful consideration of the evidence, we are prepared to say that it is weaker than the allegations of the complaint. And, if the objection here insisted upon as to the character of this evidence is good, then an objection could well have been taken to the complaint at the very inception of the litigation.

This case has been thoroughly argued, and a great portion of that argument has been addressed to the character of the contract entered into between these parties. But from the standpoint at which we view the litigation that question is immaterial. We are satisfied that the action is in no sense one to enforce a contract. Whatever relationship the transaction pictured by the aforesaid recitals of the complaint bears to the cause of action, it is a relationship disaffirmed and repudiated. The good or bad morals of this undertaking are immaterial, for the reason that the venture was in no sense executed, and until executed both parties are given an opportunity for repentance and rescission. Seeing the error of his ways, the law says a party may withdraw from the transaction; and it extends to him a helping hand by offering the inducement of giving back to him anything of value with which he has parted. Putting this case against plaintiff as bad as may be imagined, he transferred his stock to be used by defendant in corrupting the servants of the respective governments. The transaction progressed no further. The stock was not so used. The precipice which would have been death to plaintiff's cause of action was never reached. No one was corrupted, and the stock was not stained. The parties' intentions as to the use to which this stock was to be put are not the controlling factor. It is not what was intended to be done with the stock that christens the transaction, but rather what was actually done. If defendant had disposed of the stock as contemplated, plaintiff would have had no remedy, for the evil would have been accomplished, the harm would have been done, and of necessity his plea for relief would not have been heard. In this case plaintiff gave certain stock to defendant, to be used for a certain purpose. He was plaintiff's bailee of the stock. The bailee did not use it for the purpose agreed upon, but took it to his own use. There is no principle of law to justify such a transaction. If plaintiff, upon the second day subsequent to the transaction, had changed his mind, and notified defendant of such change, and demanded a return of his stock, upon principle and authority he would have been entitled to such return. The authorities all told that, if he had done this any day prior to the time when the agreement was fully executed, he would be entitled to the return of his stock. That this agreement was purely executory cannot be questioned. It could not be executed until the stock was applied to the purposes intended. If the question as to what company should obtain the leases here sought were still an open one, if it had not been settled at the commencement of this action, and if the stock had not been applied as contemplated, then, certainly, plaintiff could recover. The fact that these leases have been secured by other parties is wholly immaterial. That fact does not enter as an element in the question here discussed, and upon principle the case stands exactly as it did a moment after the stock was transferred to the defendant. The authorities seem to be in direct accord with the views we have expressed. Our investigation has led us to the examination of many cases aside from those cited by counsel, and we find no case opposed to the doctrine of a right of recovery upon the part of a plaintiff where similar facts are presented. There are hundreds of cases found in the reports of this country and England where courts have refused to entertain actions based upon unlawful or void contracts. Our state reports contain many of them. At the present day it may be said that all courts agree upon that doctrine. In Langton v. Hughes, 1 Maule & S. 599,—a case which is the landmark upon this question in English reports,—it is held that a druggist is not entitled to recover for drugs sold a brewer which he knew were to be used by the brewer in unlawful manufacture. The judge declared that by such sale the druggist aided and abetted the brewer in violating the law. A common and simple illustration is found where an action is brought to recover money loaned to another for the purpose and intention of playing a gambling game prohibited by law. McKinnell v. Robinson, 3 Mees. & W. 434; Tyler v. Carlisle, 79 Me. 211.

The case at bar, upon its facts, does not bring it within the rule declared by the foregoing authorities. Those are all actions to recover money agreed to be paid upon an illegal contract. It was sought to enforce agreements made by contracting parties. Here Sloss was the agent or bailee of the plaintiff. He was given stock to be used by him for a certain purpose. The stock was still the property of the plaintiff; the title was still in him. Sloss, as long as he retained possession of it, as long as he did not apply it according to instructions, held it purely as the agent of the plaintiff. He could only apply it to the single purpose authorized. If he converted it to his own use, it would be criminal embezzlement. For a court to support his present position would not be in the interest of sound public policy, but, on the contrary, would be offering a premium upon the dishonesty of agents, servants, and bailees. It is said in Norton v. Blinn, 39 Ohio St. 145, 22 Am. L. Reg. (N. S.) 785: "In the second place it is contrary to public policy and good morals to permit employees, agents, or servants to seize or retain the property of their principal, although it may be employed in illegal business and under their control. No consideration of public policy can justify a lowering of the standard of moral honesty required of persons in these relations." In this case, if the stock had been applied to the purpose intended, plaintiff would have no standing in court, for in the language of many cases the unlawful purpose would have been carried out; and this principle applies in all those cases where money or property is given to another party to be used in an illegal transaction. Persons may not be punished, either in civil or criminal courts, for unlawful intentions. It is the consummation of these unlawful intentions that places a party without the law. If the unlawful intention or transaction is not carried out, if nothing is done under it, my servant has my property, and I am entitled to its return. As in the present case, he is acting under a special agency which I have a right to revoke at any time before performance, and, when so revoked, I am entitled to my own. It cannot be better public policy to deny me a recovery of the stock than to encourage my agent to commit a criminal offense. Dunlap's Paley, Agency, *66, declares the general principle thus: "As long as money deposited with an agent for an illegal purpose remains unemployed, or if the purpose be countermanded by the principal before application, it is a debt which may be recovered at law or in equity." Wood, Mast. & S. § 202, says: "While the courts will not enforce an illegal contract, yet if a servant or agent of another has, in the prosecution of an illegal enterprise for his master, received money or other property belonging to the master, he is bound to turn it over to him, and cannot shield himself from liability therefor, upon the ground of the illegality of the original transaction." In Adams Exp. Co. v. Reno, 48 Mo. 204, it was held that Reno, who had deposited a certain sum of money in the bank, which money was to be paid to a sheriff when he secured the pardon of Reno's brother, who was then in the penitentiary, could recover the money as his money as long as it remained in the possession of the bank. Taylor v. Lendey, 9 East, 49, is a case where plaintiff gave a sum of money to the governor of the poor house to be used for the use of the poor, a magistrate agreeing to stifle a threatened prosecution against him in consideration thereof. Plaintiff brought an action to recover the money so given to the governor. Lord Ellenborough said: "Take it that the money had been paid by the plaintiff to the defendant for a charitable purpose, but before the defendant had made any application of it the plaintiff countermanded the payment: was there not then an end of the authority, and could the agent persist in applying it against the direction of his principal? The question, therefore, is reduced to the case of a countermanded agent." In Peters v. Grim, 149 Pa. 164, in referring to an unlawful transaction in stocks, the court said: "If when the first deposit was made by plaintiff with directions to buy the stock, he had countermanded the directions before anything was done under them, it could not be pretended that defendant could have retained the money on the ground of illegality in the contemplated transaction. Intent as to a future act does not make illegality." In Morgan v. Groff, 4 Barb. 524, it is held that "as long as money deposited with an agent for an illegal purpose remains unemployed, or if the purpose be countermanded by the principal before its application, it is a debt which may be recovered from the agent by the principal, either at law or in equity." That was a case where money was given to an agent to be bet upon an election, which money the agent failed to bet, but converted to his own use. In Bone v. Ekless, 5 Hurlst. & N. 924, the owner of a ship authorized his agent to sell the same for £8,500 to the Turkish government, and to expend £500 of that amount in bribing government officials to assist in making the sale. The ship was sold, and the agent paid out £300 of the £500 as contemplated. In an action the owner was held entitled to recover the £200, notwithstanding the agent pleaded the facts showing the use to which the money was to be applied; one of the judges saying: "But the real nature of the case is, that the plaintiff received the whole of the money upon the sale of the defendant's ship, and now claims to retain part of the money upon the illegal arrangement, which, however, he has not carried out. He might have discharged himself by actual payment of the money, but he has not paid it: the illegality would have been the payment for illegal purpose. Before that was done the defendant claimed the money and was entitled to recover it." See also Taylor v. Bowers, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 291. In Johnston v. Russell, 87 Cal. 670, the law is declared that either party to a wagering contract upon the election may withdraw from the transaction at any time before the event upon which the result of the wager is dependent has happened, and under such circumstances the party withdrawing may recover his money from the stakeholder. From the legal principle declared by that case, it necessarily follows that the same party could have recovered his money from an agent to whom he had given it to be wagered. When the money has passed into the hands of the stakeholder the law has been violated. When it is in the hands of the agent or servant to be wagered no violation of the law has yet occurred. It follows that the doctrine of the above case goes to lengths beyond anything demanded by the facts of the case at bar. It will thus be seen from the array of cases cited that authority is not lacking to support plaintiff's right of recovery. There are cases containing incidental statements that may look the other way, but the facts there were not the facts of this case. In those cases it will be found that the plaintiff relied upon an illegal contract for a recovery, and the statements made were not necessary to the decision of the case, and not called for by the facts before the court.

The court is asked to sustain the order granting the motion for a nonsuit upon the fifth ground stated. It is claimed by respondent's counsel that a serious "variance" exists between the evidence of plaintiff and his principal witness, Seligman. Conceding such a variance to exist, any question arising from it cannot be raised upon a motion for nonsuit. It is but fair to respondent, Sloss, to say that by his answer he in no way relies upon the illegality of any contract entered into between himself and Wassermann for the purpose of defeating Wassermann's cause of action. He claims that he purchased the stock from Wassermann, and relies upon his title under such purchase.

Judgment and order reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: Harrison, J.; Van Fleet, J.

v.

C. F. EATON et al., Appls.

(117 Cal. 539.)

1. A riparian proprietor cannot confer upon another person the right to divert water from a stream to use on nonriparian lands to the injury of a lower proprietor, since the riparian owner himself has a right to divert waters to riparian lands only.

2. Equity may restrain the diversion of water under a claim of right in order to prevent the claim from ripening into a right.

3. The manner in which water diverted from a stream is returned to it is immaterial to a lower riparian proprietor if the water is returned before the stream reaches his land.

(July 9, 1897.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Santa Barbara County in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding to enjoin them from diverting to nonriparian lands certain waters from a stream which flowed through plaintiff's property. Modified and affirmed.

The facts as stated in the report in 111 Cal. 639, mentioned in the opinion, are as follows:

The Cold Spring branch of Montecito creek has its rise in the Santa Inez mountains, and flows in a southerly direction through a canyon on the southerly slope of said mountains. These mountains in the neighborhood of said stream are composed chiefly of parallel strata of sandstone, extending across the canyon, and separated by seams parallel with the strata, filled with clay which is impervious to water. This sandstone is porous and fissured with seams and cracks, both parallel with the strata and transversely thereto. The trend of the strata is nearly east and west, and nearly at right angles with the general course of the canyon and of the stream, and the dip of the strata is toward the north, and at an angle of about 80 degrees. The stream has a fall of about 400 feet to the mile, and its natural supply is the rain which falls upon the adjacent mountains, and descends into the sandstone, precolating through it, and passing along the seams and cracks thereof in a direction with the trend of the strata. The plaintiff is the owner of a tract of land through which the stream flows, and from which his land derives a benefit. In October, 1892, the owner of a tract of land extending on both sides of the stream above that of the plaintiff granted to the defendants the right to enter thereon and excavate a tunnel for developing water, and in pursuance thereof the defendants commenced the construction of a tunnel at a point about 30 feet west of the stream, and at an elevation of about 4 feet above its level, and continued the construction of said tunnel in a northerly direction for about 600 feet. The tunnel was constructed so as to be throughout the greater part of its length below the level of the stream, and so that this depth increased gradually toward the head or northern end, where it was about 50 feet below the level of the stream. At a point about 300 feet from the mouth of the tunnel there is a bold out-cropping of one of the strata of said sandstone, and for a space of 80 yards along the canyon, extending from near the foot of the western slope of the mountains to the margin of the stream, a distance of about 100 feet, the water prior to the construction of the tunnel, percolating through this stratum, moistened the ground and sustained thereon a growth of ferns. Within the growth of ferns there were, prior to the construction of the tunnel, certain small springs, the waters of which came to the surface in such quantities as to be visible, and percolating through said ferns seeped into the stream along the western bank thereof, but did not form a defined channel or current. The line of the tunnel was a short distance west of this growth of ferns and the locality of these springs, and also about 40 feet below the level of the same, and the effect of its construction has been to intercept and divert into and through the tunnel the waters that had previously supplied the springs, and to cause the same, and the seepage therefrom into the stream, to wholly disappear. The porous character of the sandstone formation which crosses the canyon permits water from the ground neighboring to and overlying the tunnel, and water from the channel of the stream, to drain into the tunnel. The court finds that the intention of the defendants in running the tunnel was to intercept and divert into said tunnel the subterranean waters stored in and percolating through said sandstone, and passing along the seams and cracks thereof, and particularly to intercept the aforesaid stratum of sandstone, and to intercept and divert into the tunnel the water precolating and passing through and along said stratum and the seams and cracks thereof, but that they did not intend to divert from their natural course any waters flowing from said springs, or to divert from said stream any water naturally flowing in the channel thereof, and that the said small springs and the waters precolating or seeping therefrom are the only tributaries of said stream affected in any way by the construction of said tunnel.

The plaintiff brought the present action to restrain the defendants from diverting the waters of the stream by means of said tunnel, and from preventing the water which would issue from the mouth of the tunnel from flowing back into the channel of the stream.

Messrs. Robert Y. Hayne and W. S. Day for appellants.

Mr. R. B. Canfield, for respondent:

Even if the appellants owned Barker's land no question as to their riparian rights would be here presented; because these have reference only to the use of water on the riparian land, while the only use defendants intend to make of the water in controversy is on nonriparian land.

NOTE.—On the general question of the rights of riparian owners to divert water from a stream, see Ulbricht v. Eufaula Water Co. (Ala.) 4 L. R. A. 572, and note; also note to Whitney v. Wheeler 38 L. R. A.

ton Mills (Mass.) 7 L. R. A. 613; Horn v. Miller (Pa.) 9 L. R. A. 810, and note; and Barre Water Co. v. Carnes (Vt.) 21 L. R. A. 769.

Pom. Riparian Rights, § 182; Creighton v. Evans, 58 Cal. 56.

Injunctions are construed according to the facts upon which the decrees are based and the purposes to be defeated or accomplished. When defendants become riparian owners and undertake to make a riparian use of the water, or when the upper riparians absorb it all, it will be time to consider the application of the judgment to their changed conditions.

Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co. 59 U. S. 18 How. 421, 15 L. ed. 485; Mahoney v. Van Winkle, 83 Cal. 448; Larrabee v. Selby, 52 Cal. 508.

If Barker himself were the owner of the tunnel he could not do what defendants have intended to do. If he should undertake to divert any of the water of the creek to nonriparian land, to that extent he would be as much a wrongdoer as though he had no riparian rights.

Pom. Riparian Rights, § 183.

If the quantity was indeterminable in consequence of the conditions under which the tunnel was constructed, it could not have been found that defendants had developed any water to which they were entitled, and the use of their tunnel as a means of obtaining water should have been prohibited altogether.

Emporia v. Soden, 25 Kan. 588, 37 Am. Rep. 265.

A riparian owner has a right to prevent a nonriparian from taking the waters of a stream by means of a tunnel into which the water is drained through the intervening ground, and which accelerates the natural percolations from the stream or creates currents from it where none formerly existed, to such an extent as to diminish the flow materially and to the detriment of lower riparians.

If the use of percolations to or from a stream is to be regulated in analogy with the use of water in a watercourse it must be under the same restrictions.

Harrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts involved in the judgment herein are set forth in the opinion given upon an appeal therefrom by the plaintiff. Gould v. Eaton, 111 Cal. 639. The present appeal is by the defendants from that portion of the judgment which enjoins them from diverting to lands not riparian to the creek any of the waters naturally flowing in its channel, and from preventing or interfering with the flow directly back into the stream from the mouth of the tunnel constructed by them, of 1.43 inches of water, measured under a 4-inch pressure. The court found that this amount of water was abstracted and diverted from the channel of the stream by reason of the tunnel constructed by the defendants, and the appeal is directly from the judgment, upon the judgment roll, without any bill of exceptions. The finding by the court of the amount of water diverted by means of the tunnel cannot be questioned, by reason of the statement therein of the mode by which this amount can be ascertained. The evidence before the court by which it determined that the loss could thus be ascertained is not before us, and it must be assumed that it was of a satisfactory character, and the conclusion of the court thereon must be accepted by us as correct.

To the extent that the water diverted by the tunnel is taken from the stream, the defendants are in no different position than they would have been if Barker, the riparian owner from whom they received the right to construct the tunnel, had given them the right to lay a pipe from the stream, and granted them the water that should flow through it. The only right in the riparian land which was granted to the defendants was "to enter thereon to prospect for water and to excavate a tunnel to develop the same at a place to be selected by them within thirty days from the date of their agreement, and the right of way over said land for the purpose of making said tunnel." Under this agreement they selected a place for the tunnel about 80 feet west of the stream, and constructed it in a direction nearly parallel with the stream. The defendants are therefore in no respect riparian owners, nor are their rights in the water which flows from the tunnel in any respect those of a riparian owner. The grant from Barker gave them no right in the land which is adjacent to the stream, and they took by the contract no riparian rights in the waters of the stream, and no greater right to these waters than Barker could confer upon any other nonriparian owner. The rights of a riparian owner are limited to the ordinary and reasonable use of the water which flows in the stream, and do not include a proprietorship in the corpus of the water. His right to the water is limited to its use for such as are termed ordinary purposes,—ad lavandum et ad potandum,—or such other uses as are connected with the land bordering on the stream. It is not necessary here to determine the extent to which such uses may be carried, or the purposes to which the water may be applied. They do not in any case include the right, as against an inferior proprietor, to divert the water to nonriparian lands. Each riparian owner is entitled to the natural flow of the stream through his land, with the limitation, however, that the superior proprietor may take therefrom such an amount as he is entitled to for riparian purposes. The superior proprietor cannot, however, divert to non-riparian lands the water which he would have a right to use for riparian purposes, but which he does not in fact use. His riparian right is appurtenant to the land bordering on the stream, and does not give him the right to divert the water to lands which are not riparian to the stream; and, as he cannot exercise this right himself, he cannot, as against an inferior proprietor, confer it upon another. As against himself or his grantee, he may contract for the diversion of the water to nonriparian lands. Gould v. Stafford, 91 Cal. 146; Yacco v. Conroy, 104 Cal. 468. But the rights of the inferior proprietor will not be affected by such contract. If he does not in fact use any of the water himself the inferior proprietor has a right to the flow of the entire stream. Stockport Waterworks Co. v. Potter, 8 Hurlst. & C. 300; Ormerod v. Todmorden Joint Stock Mill Co. L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 155; Swindon Waterworks Co. v. Proprietors of Wilts & B. Canal Nav. Co. L. R. 7 H. L. 697. The plaintiff's right to an injunction does not depend upon the amount of injury which he has received. Being a riparian owner, he has a right to the flow of the entire stream, as against any diminution thereof by one who is not a riparian owner, and the claim of the defendants that they have a right to divert a portion of its flow authorizes him to invoke the aid of equity in order that this claim may not ripen into a right. Moore v. Clear Lake Waterworks, 69 Cal. 146; Stanford v. Felt, 71 Cal. 249; Swindon Waterworks Co. v. Proprietors of Wilts & B. Canal Nav. Co. L. R. 7 H. L. 705.

That portion of the judgment which requires the defendants to permit this amount of water to flow back into the creek "in the manner in which the water from said tunnel was flowing back into said creek at the time of the commencement of the trial of this action" is not authorized. If the water which is diverted from the creek is allowed to return to it before it reaches the land of the plaintiff, the manner in which it is returned is immaterial to him; and, if the defendants can at any time change the manner in which it at present is returned, with advantage to themselves, they should be allowed this privilege, so long as the rights of the plaintiff are not impaired.

The judgment should be modified in another particular. The court finds that, as the tunnel is now constructed and used, it diverts the amount of 1.43 inches of water from the stream, and will continue to divert this amount of water "under the conditions now existing." The judgment, however, renders it incumbent on the defendants to permit 1.43 inches of water to flow back into the stream under all circumstances, and independent of the conditions now existing. It should be modified by giving to either party leave, upon showing that these conditions have changed to an extent authorizing the interference of the court, or that the operation and use of the tunnel will justify it, to apply for a corresponding change in the judgment.

The Superior Court is directed to modify its judgment in accordance with the foregoing opinion, and, as so modified, the judgment will stand affirmed.

Mrs. J. B. RABBITT

v.

William M. WILCOXEN, Receiver, etc., of Union Building & Savings Association, Appt.

R. M. DIHEL et al., Interveners.

(.....Iowa.....)

Notice of withdrawal before the appointment of a receiver of a building and savings association does not give priority to a shareholder of an insolvent association under by-laws providing for the payment of withdrawals "according to the priority of notice," but also providing that no more should be paid in any month than 30 per cent of the cash receipts of the loan fund during that month, as these by-laws contemplate a going concern.

(October 8, 1897.)

NOTE.—For the general subject of withdrawals from building and loan associations, see Engelhardt v. Fifth Ward Permanent Dime, Sav. & L. Assn. (N. Y.) 85 L. R. A. 239.

APPEAL by the receiver of the Union Building & Savings Association from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County allowing certain claims to the interveners in settling the affairs of the association. Reversed.

Statement by Granger, J.:

The following, including some provisions of the law of the association, to be noticed in the opinion, is substantially appellees' statement of the facts. "The Union Building & Savings Association was incorporated under the laws of Iowa, on the 26th of June, 1890, with its principal place of business in the city of Des Moines. The object of the association, as stated in its articles of incorporation, being 'to afford profitable investment of money, and encourage and assist its shareholders in the acquisition of real estate, by loaning money to them, to be paid back in monthly instalments, thereby increasing the proportion of home owners in the country, in the manner and by the means provided in chapter 6, title 9, of the Code of Iowa.' On the 15th of December, 1894, Mrs. J. B. Rabbitt, plaintiff in the original cause, petitioned the district court of Polk county for the appointment of a receiver for the association; and on the 28th day of December, 1894, the court appointed William M. Wilcozen, Esq., receiver, to take charge of the assets of the association, and collect and convert the same into money, with a view to the winding up of the association. On the 4th day of December, 1895, R. M. Dihel et al. filed their petition of intervention, and, in a few days thereafter, others filed petitions of intervention, all of said petitions claiming the same relief. The petitions of intervention are substantially the same, and claim that the petitioners filed their notices of withdrawal, as provided by § 9 of article 13 of the by-laws, and for that reason they are entitled to be paid, according to said § 9 of article 13 of the by-laws, prior to the payment or distribution of the funds among the stockholders of said corporation who did not file their notice of withdrawal. They claim that they are no longer stockholders of said corporation, and have not been since the moment of filing their notices of withdrawal, but are creditors with claims, according to the terms of § 9 of article 13 of the by-laws. On the 7th day of December, 1895, William M. Wilcozen, receiver, filed his answer, and it was agreed that this answer should apply to all the petitions of intervention. Said answer is found on page 11 of the abstract, and in substance states that the association, at the time of filing said notices of withdrawal, was insolvent; that article 17 of the by-laws of said association provides that said association shall not be liable to pay out, on account of withdrawals of all classes of stock during any month, more than 30 per cent of the cash receipts of the loan fund during such month; and that there had been since January 1, 1894, during each month, more than 30 per cent paid out; and, further, it states that said interveners have not complied with all things necessary in order to perfect their withdrawals, in accordance with the 'Articles of Incorporation and By-Laws' of the association; and, further, it is stated that to allow the claims of these interveners to be paid in full would impair the value of the outstanding securities, etc.; and then prays that the claims of the interveners be adjudged to be on a parity with the claims of the nonwithdrawing shareholders of said association, and that they be made to share their pro rata proportion with the other shareholders in the funds coming into the hands of the receiver." The district court determined the issues in favor of the interveners, and gave judgment accordingly, and the receiver appealed.

Messrs. Sammis & Scott, for appellant:

When the constating instruments of a building association permit the withdrawal of shares, but limit the payment of the sum withdrawn to a particular fund, the existence of that particular fund is a condition precedent to the right of payment, upon an assumed condition of solvency of the association, such solvency is a condition precedent to the right of payment.

The true English rule is to the effect that to entitle a withdrawing member to payment, the notice of withdrawal must have been matured—"become effective" before the association is known to be insolvent.

Re Sunderland 32d Universal Building Societies, L. R. 24 Q. B. Div. 894; Endlich, Bldg. Asso. 2d ed. § 108.

Messrs. William M. Wilcozen and Bishop, Bowen, & Fleming, also for appellant:

After a stockholder in a building and loan association has given notice of the withdrawal of his stock he is no longer entitled to vote his stock, no longer obliged to pay his monthly dues, no longer liable to fines and penalties for failure to pay monthly dues, but he is still a stockholder, he has not ceased to be a stockholder, or shareholder, all he has is represented by those shares. He may become a creditor under certain conditions, or rather when certain conditions have been fulfilled.

Appellees would at no time after giving notice of their withdrawal have been entitled to maintain a suit thereon against the association, even while it was a going concern, the amount paid each month on withdrawals being in excess of the limit provided for in the by-laws.

Texas Homestead Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Kerr (Tex.) 18 S. W. 1020; Toules v. American Bldg. Loan & Inv. Soc. 61 Fed. Rep. 446.

The rights of the interveners were at the time of their notice of withdrawal, not to withdraw the money that they had paid in and what was shown by the books to be profits, but to withdraw their proportionate share of the net collectible assets of the association.

Knoblanck v. Robert Blum Bldg. & L. Asso. 25 Pittsb. L. J. 39; Puffert v. Robert Blum Bldg. & L. Asso. 25 Pittsb. L. J. 40.

To allow a member to retire and demand all he paid in, without contributing anything to losses which are manifest and impending, would be unjust toward his fellow members. And it would be bad faith in him. He has a right to share the profits while a member, and he must also bear his proportion of the losses.

Messrs. C. A. Ballreich and Read & Read, for interveners:

The concern was going until December 23, 1894, and all who filed their notices of withdrawal before that date changed their relation according to former agreement, and now have a claim against the fund in the hands of the receiver, according to the terms of withdrawal.

A stockholder of a building association can arbitrarily divest himself of his membership, cut loose from the association, and end his debts and liabilities.

Thompson, Bldg. Asso. chap. 7, §§ 1, 8.

The action of the association, as relates to appellees, determined them to be creditors,—so recognized them because they ceased paying dues, fines, or other expenses; and no court in christendom can change the relation of these interveners to the association after having been established by its officers and under the articles for withdrawal.

Hennighausen v. Tischer, 50 Md. 588; McKenney v. Diamond State Loan Asso. (Del.) 18 Atl. 905; Thompson, Bldg. Asso. p. 87, § 11.

The law recognizes the investing member, or the member who is an investor, as a member who assumes debts and rights which differ from those of a borrower.

Thompson, Bldg. Asso. chap. 8, § 6.

The by-laws require a withdrawing member to give a written notice of his intention to withdraw. This the interveners did. The secretary, or some person having control of such matters in the organization, should enter upon the book kept for that purpose the amount to be paid upon the withdrawal, which was done in this case.

The moment a member gives notice of withdrawal his character and relation to the association have changed; he at once becomes from debtor to creditor to the amount of his legal claims, and is entitled to recover as much of the withdrawal value as fixed by the by-laws in withdrawing, and if payment was refused he is strictly within the rule as creditor.

Hennighausen v. Tischer, 50 Md. 588; McKenney v. Diamond State Loan Asso. (Del.) 18 Atl. 905.

It is supposed that while an organization is in force the withdrawing member shall be paid out of the funds designated for that purpose, but it is not intended that a lack of funds shall defeat the member's right, and when he has given notice of withdrawal before the association has wound up he is entitled to be paid out of the assets after outside creditors in the priority of those members who had not given notice, though there were no funds for payment at the time he gave notice.

Messrs. Dudley & Coffin, E. T. Morris, Ayres, Woodin, & Ayres, and J. K. Macomber for appellees.

Granger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The case involves no controversy as to general creditors, nor as to any creditors except in so far as the withdrawing shareholders may be regarded as creditors, as to which fact there is some controversy in argument. There are two classes of persons who claim to be entitled to participate in the distribution of the assets of the corporation: First, those who gave notice of withdrawal before the appointment of the receiver, who claim to be preferred, and to be entitled to full payment before the other shareholders are entitled to anything; and, second, those who did not give such notice, who claim that all shareholders (that is, both classes) should share equally. The articles of incorporation provide for two funds,—a loan fund and an expense fund. The following is a provision of the by-laws under which it is claimed that the withdrawing shareholders should be preferred and first paid: "Sec. 9. Any shareholder in good standing, after giving thirty (30) days' notice in writing, and upon the surrender of his certificate, may withdraw, after three (3) months' dues have been paid, the full amount of his payments to the loan fund, together with the earnings up to the last dividend period. Said withdrawals shall be paid according to the priority of notice." The stock of the corporation is classed from A to F, but the classification is not important for our consideration. The following is a further provision of the by-laws: "Article XVII. This association shall not be liable to pay out on account of withdrawals of all classes of stock, during any one month, more than thirty (30) per cent of the cash receipts of the loan fund during such month, upon all classes of stock except Class F, and except stock issued under the provisions of § 2 of article VII. of the by-laws. In case of withdrawal before maturity, there shall be charged against the book value thereof a withdrawal fee of 10 cents on each share." By a misappropriation, the loan fund has been used for the expenses of the corporation to an amount in excess of $36,000, and while, in argument, there is some contention otherwise, the corporation is insolvent. In considering the rights of withdrawing shareholders from such associations, the cases discuss the effect of the association being, at the time of withdrawal, "a going concern," or insolvent, and its affairs being "wound up." It is quite evident that the by-laws of this association were adopted with reference to doing business, rather than with reference to closing up its affairs. This fact is important in determining what must have been the mutual understanding of the incorporators in their adoption of the article and laws, and also the understanding of those who became shareholders afterwards. Section 9 of article 13 gives the absolute right of withdrawal on thirty days' notice, and just as absolute a right to withdraw payments to the loan fund, except that it must be done in a way prescribed. That method is fixed by article 17, which exempts the association from liability for such withdrawals, so that it is not required to pay, in any one month, more than 30 per cent of the cash receipts of the loan fund during such month. Speaking of such an association as a going concern, there would seem to be no question but that a withdrawing shareholder, on presentation of his certificate, could demand and should receive payment, in the order of his withdrawal, of as much money as the treasury afforded, of the 30 per cent specified, and no more. If there were no provision for such payment, none could be made from the fund, and the shareholder must hold his stock or exchange it in the market. The right of withdrawing the stock—that is, withdrawing the payments—depends entirely on the by-laws authorizing it. The by-law is not a limitation on a prior right,—that is, a right existing independent of the by-law, perforce of a person being a shareholder,—but it is a grant of a right, and limited by the terms of the grant.

In Heinbokel v. National Sav. Loan & Bldg. Assn. 58 Minn. 340, 25 L. R. A. 215, this particular question is considered. The by-law in that case is so like the one in this case as to make the authority entirely applicable. It is said in that case: "In assuming the relation of a member of the association plaintiff contracted with reference to, and was to be governed by, its by-laws in so far as they were reasonable, and not opposed to our statutory provisions regulating associations of this character. He agreed to abide by the condition of the treasury in case of a withdrawal, and to take his money when funds properly applicable for the purpose were on hand. He was not to be paid until these funds were in the treasury, and, although he could at any time cease to be a member, and terminate his obligation to make monthly payments, the amount to be returned to him did not then become due or payable except in a certain contingency. If not absolutely and immediately due and payable at withdrawal, it is difficult to see how his cause of action was then maintainable." In that case the questions are considered whether or not a withdrawing shareholder becomes a creditor upon complying with the law for withdrawing his payments, and also whether he could bring an action and obtain judgment against the as-association when there is no money legally applicable for the payment of his claim. It is held that such a shareholder is not to be regarded as having the rights of the ordinary creditor, and hence that he could not maintain such an action. It is further said in that case: "The right to withdraw and to receive back what has been paid into the treasury by a member of the association exists solely by virtue of the by-law or the statute. If this right to receive money out of the treasury is made to depend upon its condition, the right is not perfect or absolute until that condition exists." In Texas Homestead Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Kerr (Tex.) 13 S. W. 1020, where the right of withdrawal was given in the by-laws, and there was a provision that at no time should more than one third of the funds in the treasury be applied to the demands of the withdrawing stockholders without the consent of the directors, it was held that there could be no recovery by such a stockholder in the absence of a showing that there were funds applicable, or that the directors had consented to the use of other funds. Christian's Appeal, 102 Pa. 184, involved a question as to the right of withdrawing stockholders to preference after the payment of the general creditors, under by-laws so similar to those in the case at bar as to make the rule of the case authority; and it is there said as to such stockholders: "If the association has been prosperous, they have a right, under certain limitations and restrictions, to demand and receive their proportionate share of the accumulated fund, but, if bad investments have been made or losses have been sustained before actual withdrawal, they must bear their just proportion thereof. . . . When a building association has failed to fulfill the object of its creation and has become hopelessly insolvent, it cannot be justly or equitably wound up on any other principle than that above suggested. After expenses incident to the administration of its assets are deducted, the general creditors, if any, should be first paid in full, and the residue of the fund should be distributed, pro rata, among those whose claims are based upon stock of the association, whether they have withdrawn and hold orders for the withdrawal value thereof, or not. Both classes are equally meritorious, and in marshaling the assets neither is entitled to priority over the other. The claims of each are alike based upon their relation to the association as members thereof." The case refers to United States Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Silverman, 85 Pa. 894; and, while it does not overrule or distinguish it, it announces the above rule with the former case in mind. It is not easy to reconcile the two cases in some particulars, and undoubtedly the last should be taken as the judgment of the court wherein, if at all, the cases are not in harmony. The Silverman Case is reviewed in Heinbokel v. National Sav. Loan & Bldg. Assn. 58 Minn. 340, 25 L. R. A. 215 (the Minnesota case), and the holding is disapproved. In Endlich, Bldg. Assn. 2d ed. § 114, it is said, speaking of the by-law provisions of such corporations, that only a proportion of the funds can be withdrawn for the purpose of paying withdrawing stockholders: "This, then, becomes a charter limitation upon the rights of withdrawing members, and operates to prevent a conflict between them and the undisturbed exercise of the association's corporate functions, by narrowing them down to a certain portion of the assets as the source of their payment."

It seems to us that these authorities, as well as the language of the by-laws of the association in this case, fix a limitation on the rights of withdrawing shareholders as to the funds applicable to the payment of their claims, and that beyond such limit they cannot go. In this case there is, confessedly, no such fund available. We have seen no case in which the limitation is like the one in this case, it being limited to 80 per cent of the monthly receipts. This limitation, throughout the authorities, in this country, seems to be of controlling importance. Insolvency but adds to the strength of such a position, and the holding in Christian's Appeal, 102 Pa. 184, is in a case where the corporation was insolvent, and the rule was there applied. Both parties have quoted from, and argued the effect of, some English cases, and, conceding them to announce a different rule (and to quite an extent they do), we are still content with the rule that is supported by the weight of authority in this country, and best accords with reason. No one contends that such a conclusion is not the equitable one, the contention of interveners being only that a correct legal construction of the by-laws justified their claim, but in that view we do not concur. As we said at the outset, the provision of the by-laws for paying back contributions to the loan fund contemplated monthly receipts to such fund, so that the corporation, as a going concern, could apply a percentage thereof to such a purpose; and there is nothing to show a purpose to make such payments after such receipts have ceased, and the only business of the corporation is a final settlement and an equitable division of the assets. We think the judgment should be so changed as to make a pro rata payment of all stockholders, regardless of notices of withdrawal, and the cause is remanded for such a decree.

Reversed.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

City of AUBURN, Appl.,
v.
UNION WATER-POWER COMPANY.

(90 Me. 578)

1. A city may be given the right by the legislature to use a reasonable portion of the waters of a great pond for the domestic purposes of its inhabitants without being liable to purchase the water from persons having mill privileges upon streams flowing from the pond.
2. Taking one-fifteenth of the water supply of a great pond for the domestic purposes of the inhabitants of a city is not so unreasonable as to give the owners of mill privileges a right to complain, where the whole supply is 15,000,000 gallons daily.
3. Mere use of the water flowing from a great pond for mill privileges is not so adverse to the rights of the public to the water that it will ripen into a title which cannot be interfered with by a state grant to a city of the right to use the water for the domestic purposes of its inhabitants.

(October 22, 1897.)

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Androscoggin County for the opinion of the full bench of an appeal by the city of Auburn from an award of county commissioners assessing damages to the Union Water Power Company of Lewiston for water taken by the city of Auburn from a great pond for domestic purposes. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. N. W. Harris, J. A. Pulsifer, W. W. Bolster, J. W. Symonds, D. W. Snow, C. S. Cook, and A. R. Savage for city of Auburn.

Messrs. W. H. White, S. M. Carter, and J. A. Morrill for Union Water Power Company.

Walton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition for the assessment of damages. It is presented by the Union Water Power Company of Lewiston, and the question is whether, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, the company is entitled to damages.

It appears that in 1891 the legislature authorized and employed the city of Auburn to take water from Wilson pond sufficient for domestic purposes and the extinguishment of fires and the supply of hotels and livery stables and laundries, and for sprinkling its streets. Private and Special Laws 1891, chap. 82.

For water taken under the authority of this act, the Union Water Power Company of Lewiston claims that it is entitled to compensation. The company claims that it has a superior and paramount right to the entire waters of the pond, "including all the natural flow of the same," and that, if any portion of the water is diverted and used by the citizens of Auburn for domestic purposes, the company is entitled to damages. The question is whether this claim can be sustained. It is the opinion of the court that, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, the claim cannot be sustained.

It is a settled rule of law in this state and Massachusetts that all great ponds,—that is, ponds containing more than 10 acres,—are owned by the state. This is a rule of law peculiar to this state and Massachusetts. It is said to have been derived from the Colonial Ordinance of 1641–47. The rule, as stated by Chief Justice Morton, in a recent Massachusetts case, is as follows:

"Under the ordinance, the state owns the great ponds as public property, held in trust for public uses. It has not only the jus privatum, the ownership of the soil, but also the jus publicum and the right to control and regulate the public uses to which the ponds shall be applied. The littoral proprietors of land upon the ponds have no peculiar rights in the soil or in the waters, unless it be by grant from the legislature." Watuppa Reservoir Co. v. Fall River, 147 Mass. 548, 1 L. R. A. 466.

In the case cited, the reservoir company had constructed an expensive dam and had paid large sums of money for flowage rights, and had controlled the waters of the Watuppa pond for nearly sixty years. The legislature then authorized the city of Fall River to take water from the pond for domestic uses and the extinguishment of fires, and all other public uses of the city, without liability to pay any other damages than the state itself would be legally liable to pay. The peculiar wording of this statute in relation to damages was undoubtedly intended to test the authority of the legislature to confer upon towns and cities the right to take water from great ponds for domestic purposes without being liable for damages; and the court so treated it; and a majority of the court held that the authority existed. The majority opinion was by Chief Justice Morton. The minority opinion was by Mr. Justice Knowlton.

We have examined the opinions with care. The minority opinion rests apparently upon the assumption that all of the waters of our great public ponds and lakes are dedicated, primarily, to the use of mills, and that no town or city can take any portion of the waters for domestic purposes without being liable in damages therefor to the owners of the mills. The majority opinion recognizes the right of the people to have pure water for domestic use, and affirms the authority of the legislature to permit towns and cities to take water from great public ponds and lakes for the use of their inhabitants without being liable to pay damages to those who want the water for the use of mills.

We think the doctrine of the majority opinion is correct. It is sustained by reason as well as authority. Water for domestic use is a necessity. Man cannot exist without it. Water for the use of mills is a convenience only. And there is no conceivable reason why those who want it for domestic use should be compelled to buy it of those who want it for the use of mills.

In Philadelphia v. Collins, 68 Pa. 106, the jury were instructed that every individual residing upon the banks of a stream has a right to the use of the water to drink, and for the ordinary uses of domestic life; and that where large bodies of people live upon the banks of a stream, as they do in large cities, the collective body of the citizens has the same right; and the instruction was held to be correct.

The right to the use of water for domestic purposes is primary, and the right to its use as a mechanical power is secondary; and to the extent that the two rights conflict, its use as a mechanical power must be surrendered. Keons v. Merriweather, 4 Ill. 492, 38 Am. Dec. 106.

True, it is sometimes said that there must be no diversion of the waters of a stream; that the riparian proprietors above must allow the water to flow on in undiminished quantities to the riparian proprietors below. But this is not a correct statement of the law. And the inaccuracy of the statement has often been pointed out. The true rule is that there must be no unlawful or unreasonable diminution or diversion of the water. The diversion and consumption of water for domestic purposes is neither unlawful nor unreasonable. As said by Mr. Justice Dickerson in Davis v. Winslow, 51 Me. 264, 81 Am. Dec. 578, "water, air, and light are the gifts of Providence, designed for the common benefit of man, and every person is entitled to a reasonable use of each. . . . Reasonable use is the touchstone to which cases of this description must be subjected."

And in another case, Mr. Justice Rice said that this right to a reasonable amount of water for domestic purposes necessarily implies a right to diminish the volume of the water. Davis v. Getchell, 50 Me. 602, 79 Am. Dec. 636.

A gallon of water withdrawn from Moosehead lake will diminish the quantity that would otherwise flow down the Kennebec river. But, surely, no one will doubt the right of the people who live near that lake to take and use for domestic purposes a reasonable amount of its waters. Nor can anyone believe that such a use would be a wrong to the owners of any of the dams across the Kennebec river. The right of the people living in the vicinity of our great ponds and lakes to a reasonable amount of their waters for domestic purposes is sustained by the rules of the common law of this state, as well as by reason and the principles of natural justice, as the cases cited will show. And it is only of our great public ponds and lakes that we are now speaking. We are not declaring or attempting to define the rights appertaining to wells, springs, rivulets, or small ponds. It is only of great ponds and lakes, the titles to which are held by the state for the use of the public, that we are now speaking.

And of these great public ponds and lakes, we affirm that by the rules of the common law of this state, the people are entitled to a reasonable portion of their waters for domestic purposes without being obliged to buy it of the owners of mill privileges. And we affirm, further, that, by virtue of the rule of property derived from the ordinance of 1641-47, as interpreted in this state as well as Massachusetts, the title to all great ponds,—that is, ponds containing more than 10 acres,—is in the state, and that the legislature may confer upon towns and cities the right to take water from such ponds for domestic purposes without making such towns and cities liable for the losses thereby sustained by the owners of mill privileges. Health is of more importance than wealth, and cleanliness is next to godliness; and we hold that the right of the people to an abundant supply of pure water, by which their health and cleanliness may be secured, is paramount to the right of mill-owners to have the water for propelling their machinery; and that, to the extent that the two rights conflict, the latter must yield. Of course, private property cannot be taken for public use without making compensation for it. But the waters of great ponds and lakes are not private property. They are owned by the state, and the state may dispose of them as it thinks proper.

Wilson pond is a great pond. Its supply of water is 15,000,000 of gallons daily. Of this quantity Auburn probably uses about a half a million of gallons daily. This is only about one thirtieth of the entire supply. It is a quantity comparatively so small that its withdrawal from the pond does not perceptibly lessen the size of the stream at the outlet. The quantity used by Auburn will probably be somewhat increased in the future. But there is no probability that the quantity used daily will ever exceed 1,000,000 of gallons. Auburn is a city large in territory; but the number of its inhabitants does not exceed 15,000; and a considerable portion of them do not and never can receive their supply of water from Wilson pond. But allowing that 10,000 of its inhabitants will at some future day receive their water from the pond, and that each one of these inhabitants will consume 100 gallons daily; then the quantity will be only 1,000,000 of gallons, leaving fourteen fifteenths of the water to flow on to the works of the Union Water Power Company as heretofore. Surely, the Union Water Power Company cannot complain that this is an unconscionable or unreasonable division of the water.

But we are asked to consider if the Union Water Power Company has not become entitled to the whole of the waters of Wilson pond by an adverse use. We do not think the use has been adverse. The company and its predecessors in title have used the water of the pond, or so much of it as has flowed out of the pond through its natural channel and become mingled with the waters of the Androscoggin river; but this has been a rightful use. It has had no element of adverseness in it. It has encroached upon no one's rights, and no one has had a right to suppress it. Such a use can never ripen into a prescriptive title. Pratt v. Lamson, 2 Allen, 275. And, besides, the authority of the state to control the waters of great ponds, and determine the uses to which they may be applied, is a governmental power, and the governmental powers of the state are never lost by mere nonuse. In Watuppa Reservoir Co. v. Fall River, 147 Mass. 548, 1 L. R. A. 466, the reservoir company has had the entire control and use of the waters of the Watuppa ponds for nearly sixty years. But the court held that the legislature might, nevertheless, confer upon the city of Fall River the right to take water from the ponds for domestic purposes without being liable to pay damages.

The Watuppa case was embarrassed by the fact that both parties had charters from the legislature. The reservoir company had been chartered as early as 1826, and granted the right to construct a reservoir dam that would raise the water 2 feet higher than it had before been raised, and to draw off the water in such quantities and at such times and in such manner as it should judge proper. And under authority of this charter the corporation had expended large sums of money and had had the entire use and control of the waters of the pond for nearly sixty years when the authority to Fall River was granted to take water from the ponds for domestic purposes. And the reservoir company claimed that it had thereby become invested with the property rights in the entire waters of the ponds of which it could not be divested without compensation. Upon this question the court was divided, three judges holding that the reservoir company was entitled to damages and four judges that it was not.

We are embarrassed by no such question. In this case only one of the parties has a charter from the legislature, and that party is the city of Auburn. The Union Water Power Company is a self-created corporation, organized under the general law. It has no charter from the legislature. It has never asked for and has never obtained from the legislature any property rights or any special privileges in the waters of Wilson pond. It has no property rights in the waters of the pond which are taxable in the city of Auburn, and we think it has no such right in its waters as entitles it to damages from the city of Auburn. See Auburn v. Union Water Power Co. 90 Me. 60.

The state's ownership of great ponds, and the authority of the legislature to permit water to be taken from such ponds for domestic purposes without the payment of damages were affirmed in Fry v. Salem & D. Aqueduct Co. 111 Mass 27.

No reason is perceived why the same doctrine should not prevail in this state. The colonial ordinance of 1641-47 is in force in this state; and it is settled law that by virtue of it the title to all great ponds is vested in the state. The right of the people to a sufficient quantity of water for domestic purposes is incontrovertible. And when, by permission of the legislature, this supply is taken from ponds which are owned by the state, no reason is perceived why the takers should be required to pay damages to persons or corporations who do not own the water. If water is taken from wells, or springs, or small ponds, or small streams, which are owned by private persons or corporations, of course, compensation must be made. But, if taken from great ponds, which are owned by the state, no reason is perceived why damages should be exacted. Water for use as a mechanical power is important, and should receive reasonable protection. But water for domestic use, and by which the health and cleanliness of the people, and protection against fires, are to be secured, is also important. And when water for both purposes is drawn from the same public fountain, no reason is perceived why either of the parties should be required to pay damages to the other.

Tested by the rules of the common law, which require a reasonable use, and, in case of conflict, a just and fair division of water, and the claim of the Union Water Power Company must fail. Tested by the rules of law derived from the colonial ordinance of 1641-47, and the result is the same. No property rights of the Union Water Power Company have been invaded by the city of Auburn. The water which the city of Auburn is using is a donation from the state. The claim of the Union Water Power Company that it is entitled to the entire waters of Wilson pond is not sustained by the evidence; and it is the opinion of the court that its claim to recover damages must be rejected.

1. To the amount that a wife's premises are enhanced in value by additions and improvements made upon them, with her consent, out of her husband's earnings, she is liable to his creditors.
2. A debtor's wife receiving her husband's earnings may entirely consume them in the suitable support of his family including herself, without becoming in any way answerable to his creditors, but as against them she cannot appropriate such earnings or income to make investments in her own name either for him or herself, or to keep down or pay off encumbrances on or otherwise improve her own property, or to pay the debts or increase the profits of her separate business.
3. A wife who turns remittances from her husband into a business which she carried on in partnership with a third person and out of which both families are supported has the burden of proving, as against the husband's creditors, that their rights have not been injured thereby, and that an equivalent sum was properly and actually consumed by the husband's family.
4. Rent for a wife's homestead occupied by her with her husband and family cannot, at least in the absence of any agreement therefor, be charged to the husband in determining the liability of the wife to his creditors for the husband's earnings which had been used to improve the premises.

APPPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Superior Court for Cumberland County dismissing a proceeding by trustee process to enforce payment of a debt due by E. V. Lynam out of assets in the hands of Linda M. Lynam, his wife, and Robert E. Campbell. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Benjamin Thompson, for appellants:

The complainant having shown that the respondent, E. V. Lynam, erected the barn upon the wife's real estate after the date of the complainant's debt, and that the moneys sent to Mrs. Lynam were used in the general account, and applied in reducing the mortgages, it is submitted that the burden is upon the respondents to relieve themselves, and to show that they have expended the same for family expenses.

Toothaker v. Allen, 41 Me. 324; Barker v. Osborne, 71 Me. 69; Haynes v. Thompson, 80 Me. 125.

If a wife, without her husband's knowledge or assent, deposits his wages, placed in her hands for safe keeping, in a savings bank, and uses the deposit with money of her own in the purchase of land, the title to which she takes and holds in her own name, the husband has an equitable interest in the land, to reach and apply which in payment of his debt a creditor of the husband may maintain a bill in equity against him and his wife.

Breenihan v. Sheehan, 125 Mass. 11.

If Captain Lynam has expended money upon improvements of his wife's real estate, such as the erection of the barn, which was not absolutely necessary and proper for the shelter and maintenance of the family, and has either remitted his money to his wife, or Mr. Campbell, to be used in improvements on the real estate, so as to keep the same from the reach of these creditors, then the same is void as to the complainants, although there was no actual fraud on Mrs. Lynam's part.

Call v. Perkins, 65 Me. 489; Sampson v. Alexander, 66 Me. 182; Merrill v. Jose, 81 Me. 22; Stratton v. Bailey, 80 Me. 345; Breenihan v. Sheehan, 125 Mass. 11; *Spelman v. The mere fact that a grantor is indebted at the time he makes a voluntary conveyance does not necessarily render such conveyance fraudulent against the existing creditors. On the other hand, since the prima facie presumption arises in such case, it is never necessary to show by affirmative evidence an actual intent to defraud, in order to render a voluntary conveyance fraudulent and void as against existing creditors.

Mr. John Peters, Jr., for appellees:

The burden has always been on complainants to show some appreciable value contributed by Captain Lynam to the property, under such circumstances as to render it liable for his debts.

Stratton v. Bailey, 80 Me. 345; Metcalf v. Metcalf, 85 Me. 478.

A wife living by force of necessity practically apart from her husband, on her own homestead, is entitled to appropriate from her husband's remittances a fair sum for the premises occupied by herself and her husband's children.

The complainants must show an interest existing in Captain Lynam which he himself could enforce, in equity.

He acquired no such interest by voluntarily building a barn on his wife's land, nothing more appearing, nor by sending home a reasonable amount of money for family expenses, even if a part of this is saved by the wife (as claimed) and used to pay a portion of her separate indebtedness on real-estate mortgages.

A husband has a right to place improvements upon his wife's land in the absence of fraud, and the same cannot be taken for his debts.

Webster v. Hildreth, 33 Vt. 457, 78 Am. Dec. 632; Robinson v. Huffman, 15 B. Mon. 80, 61 Am. Dec. 177; Eilers v. Conradt, 89 Minn. 242; Lewis v. Johns, 24 Cal. 98, 85 Am. Dec. 49; *Phillips v. In all cases where a bill has been sustained on facts similar to those claimed by complainants, fraud has been conclusively made to appear, as in Lynde v. McGregor, 18 Allen, 182, 90 Am. Dec. 188.

In Indiana the court goes farther than this, and holds that participation by the wife in her husband's fraudulent design must be shown.

Lynde v. McGregor, 18 Allen, 182, 90 Am. Dec. 188.

Money and labor expended voluntarily by a husband upon his wife's land give him no right, title, or interest therein.

Emery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

From the documents and the testimony of the various defendants themselves, the following facts appear to be practically undisputed:

In 1859 the defendant Linda M. Lynam (then Linda M. Clement) was the owner, by inheritance from her father, of a homestead at Seal Harbor, Mt. Desert, and was living upon it with her mother. In that year she married the defendant Capt. Eri V. Lynam, and the pair began married life upon this homestead, and their home has been upon it ever since. The family has consisted of Mr. and Mrs. Lynam, their children, and Mrs. Lynam's mother. In 1882 the defendant Robert E. Campbell married a daughter of the other two defendants, and lived with her upon the same homestead as a member of the family. Capt. Lynam's occupation was that of master mariner, and he was absent most of the time after 1874 upon foreign voyages.

In 1883 Mrs. Lynam and her son-in-law, Campbell, began the enterprise of building and running a summer hotel on her place. One hotel building was erected and furnished in 1884, and a second one in 1887. The money was raised by notes of Mrs. Lynam and her mother, Mrs. Clement, secured by a mortgage of the homestead. In this way money was borrowed as follows: In 1883, $4,000, at 8 per cent; in 1884, $6,600, at 8 per cent; in 1887, $1,500, at 8 per cent—amounting to $12,100. In addition to the above, $2,500 were borrowed on note alone, at 7 per cent in 1887. The business was managed by Campbell, for himself and Mrs. Lynam, under the name of Lynam & Campbell. Mrs. Lynam and a minor daughter worked in and about the hotel during the season, at least. The interest on the loans, aggregating over $1,000 annually, and occasionally small sums upon the principal, were paid from year to year, up to 1892. A $1,000 payment was made in 1889, and another $1,000 payment in 1893. In 1894 some of the property of Mrs. Lynam was sold to one Cooksey, and from the proceeds of that sale the various mortgages were finally paid that year.

During all this time Capt. Lynam was away at sea, coming home at infrequent intervals and for short stops only. From time to time he remitted sums of money to his wife, the different remittances varying in amount from $50 to $500. They were usually by draft or check. In making these remittances, Capt. Lynam gave no directions as to what should be done with the money. He seems to have left its disposition entirely to his wife's discretion. The remittances, with but few if any exceptions, were turned over by Mrs. Lynam to Mr. Campbell, and by him deposited in the bank to the credit of Lynam & Campbell,—in the same account with the hotel business. One draft of $350 was sent direct to Mr. Campbell, who deposited it to the same account. The aggregate amount of these remittances is much in dispute. The respondents admit that they averaged $700 yearly. The plaintiffs claim that they were nearer $1,200 per year. There seems to be no exact account of the amount, and it is to be largely determined by inference from circumstances.

As stated above, nearly all the remittances, whatever the amount, were turned into the funds of Lynam & Campbell. Out of these funds of Lynam & Campbell were paid the hotel expenses, the interest on the notes, the partial payments upon the principal, and also the family expenses of the Lynam and Campbell families, who were living together. No accounts were kept, and both Mrs. Lynam and Mr. Campbell are utterly unable to state the amount expended for either or both families. The two families comprised five persons,—Mrs. Lynam, her mother, and an unmarried minor daughter, with Mr. and Mrs. Campbell. Nor were any accounts kept of the hotel business, but both Mrs. Lynam and Mr. Campbell say there was little or no profit in it. Mrs. Lynam says there was a loss.

At a period about midway between the years 1874 and 1883, Capt. Lynam, with his wife's consent, built a stable on the homestead, expending thereon about $800 of his own money. He does not claim to have built the stable with his own labor, and, as he was away at sea a greater part of the time after his marriage, it is a fair inference that the stable was built out of his money.

But all this while, and as early as 1874, Capt. Lynam was indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of over $1,500, with interest, which he has never paid any part of, and has had no property in his name with which to pay it. This indebtedness (now in the form of a judgment) does not seem to have been known to Mrs. Lynam or Mr. Campbell till 1890.

The plaintiffs now bring this bill in equity, in the nature of an equitable trustee process, under Rev. Stat. chap. 77, § 6, cl. 10, to reach and apply to their judgment the money of Capt. Lynam thus appropriated or used in the improvement of Mrs. Lynam's property and in her business enterprise. They claim that they have shown a direct appropriation of their debtor's money to the erection of the stable, which they say ought, in equity at least, to be appropriated to his debts. While they do not claim to have shown any direct appropriation of any specific sum of their debtor's money to the payments on the hotel erections, they do claim they have shown a general appropriation of nearly all his earnings by the business association of Lynam & Campbell, and their incorporation into the fund from which that concern paid the interest, and some parts at least of the principal of the hotel mortgages. They further claim that, having shown this, the burden is on the respondents to show that the debtor's money thus taken was in fact expended for his family's suitable maintenance, and that they have failed to do this, and hence should submit to its reappropriation for his debts.

The justice hearing the cause in the first instance did not sustain these claims of the plaintiffs, but dismissed the bill upon the following grounds, among others: (1) As to the stable, that it was built without any understanding between Capt. Lynam and his wife as to its ownership, and so became a part of the wife's realty, with no legal or equitable title thereto left in him; (2) that Mrs. Lynam was entitled to deduct from her husband's remittances a fair rental for her homestead occupied by their family; (3) that, making the above allowance for rent, it did not appear that any appreciable or ascertainable part of Capt. Lynam's remittances was in fact applied to his wife's property or business. The justice seemed to put on the plaintiffs the burden of showing such specific application. He also seemed to intimate that there was or might be a surplus if the rent were excluded.

On account of the intimacy of the marriage relation, the husband and wife cannot ignore the creditors of either to the extent that two strangers might. A debtor's wife receiving her husband's earnings may entirely consume them in the suitable support of his family, including herself, without becoming in any way answerable to his creditors. She has no right, however, as against his prior creditors, to appropriate her husband's earnings or income to making investments in her own name, either for him or herself, or to keeping down or paying off encumbrances on, or otherwise improving, her own property, or to paying the debts or increasing the profits of her separate business. Nor can she rightfully retain, as against them, the value of permanent additions voluntarily made by him to her property. Outside of the statute exemptions, he cannot acquire any property which shall be free from the claims of prior creditors, nor can she acquire such property out of his principal or income. Whenever it appears that she has thus absorbed his money or estate, she can be compelled to account for it by this equitable trustee process. The prior creditor of the husband need not show an actual fraudulent intent on the part of either husband or wife. It is enough for him to show that the wife has acquired some property or value out of her husband's unexempted principal or income. This value thus obtained should be restored by her for the payment of his prior debts, though the husband or his representatives might have no legal or equitable claim to such restoration. The wife may owe a duty of restoration to her husband's prior creditors without owing any such duty to him. These propositions are deducible from the following cases: Coll v. Perkins, 65 Me. 446; Sampson v. Alexander, 66 Me. 182; Robinson v. Clark, 76 Me. 494; Lane v. Lane, 76 Me. 526; Stratton v. Briley, 80 Me. 845; Merrill v. Jose, 81 Me. 22; Berry v. Berry, 84 Me. 541.

1. It is undisputed that Capt. Lynam, while in debt to the plaintiffs, and having no visible property of his own, directly expended, with his wife's consent, some $300 of his own money in making a permanent, visible, appreciable addition to his wife's estate and to its value,—not merely keeping up the estate, or carrying it on, but adding to it. This addition (stable) became a part of the wife's realty, and Capt. Lynam himself, as found by the justice of the first instance, may have no right in it, or to reimbursement for it.

Under the principles above stated, however, the husband's right is not the test of his prior creditors' rights. As to them, neither husband nor wife can erect buildings on her land with his money, and retain the benefit. In the absence of fraudulent intent or active participation upon the part of the wife, it might not be equitable to require her to account for the full sum thus subtracted from her husband's means and appropriated to her property, since the benefit to her estate might not be so much, but she should not retain any benefit or increment in value of his estate made at the expense of her husband's prior creditors. To turn over to those creditors the benefit or increment, if any, thus obtained, would cause her no loss of her own property, but would simply transmit some part of the husband's property to his creditors,—a most equitable proceeding.

2. It is undisputed that Capt. and Mrs. Lynam and their family lived upon her homestead. It does not appear, however, that there was ever any agreement or understanding between them for the payment of rent by him to her therefor. Without expressing an opinion upon the effect of such an agreement if its existence were shown, it may be safely said that in the absence of that agreement the wife has no right to such rent from the husband. It is true the wife may, at her will, manage and dispose of her own property, including her homestead upon which the family live. She may lease it to other parties, and recover and retain the rent; but while she occupies it herself with her husband and family she cannot, at least in the absence of any agreement, require the husband to pay to her rent therefor. The relation between them as to such occupancy is that of husband and wife uniting to make a common home. The relation of landlord and tenant is not to be inferred or implied. The occupation is that of both. Southworth v. Edmands, 152 Mass. 208, 9 L. R. A. 118. There are doubtless numberless instances in this country where the husband and wife and family are living upon a homestead owned by the wife, yet no case has been found of a claim made in the courts by the wife against the husband or his estate for the rent, in the absence of an agreement. This circumstance is strong against the validity of such a claim.

If the wife cannot insist on such rent as against her husband or his estate, it follows that she cannot insist upon it as against his creditors. Her husband's indebtedness does not create for her a new right in his property.

3. A wife simply keeping her own and her husband's home and family need not account to her husband's creditors for any part of his income received by her, so long as it does not appear that she is using any part of it for her separate profit. In this case, however, it does affirmatively appear that the wife, with a business associate, was engaged in a business for her own profit, entirely apart from her husband, and that all or nearly all of her husband's remittances were, in the first instance, turned into this business, to the account of Lynam & Campbell. The support of the families of both was drawn indiscriminately from the funds of the business. This procedure was certainly unjust to her husband's creditors,—this subjecting their debtor's income, not solely to the support of himself and family, but to the risk of a business from which he was in no event to derive any profit or increase of estate. At least, it has put on the wife and her business partner the duty of showing affirmatively that such absorption of her husband's income into her property and business worked no wrong to his creditors; that an equivalent sum was properly and actually consumed by the husband's family. This they have not done. At the most, they only give a guess.

It is urged at this point that the justice of the first instance has found this to be the fact, and that his finding of fact is not to be reversed unless clearly wrong. We do not understand the justice to have found this specific fact. His finding was general, including both law and fact. He seemed to concede that the Lynam family expenses alone, not counting rent, might not have consumed the remittances. He made much account of the rent in arriving at his conclusion.

The lamentable tendency of so many debtors to transfer their means and earnings to their wives' possession, or to expend them upon their wives' property, not for the support of the family, but to store them away from the reach of their creditors, renders it necessary for the courts to scrutinize thoroughly, and even with suspicion, any such transaction, however innocent it may appear on the surface.

The wife must not be allowed to absorb the debtor husband's property under the cover of family support. Robinson v. Clark, 78 Me. 494; Seitz v. Mitchell, 94 U. S. 580, 24 L. ed. 179. Applying that scrutiny to this case, we are satisfied that at least $1,500 of the debtor husband's earnings have been used in additions and improvements upon the wife's real estate, with her consent, by which her estate has been increased in value to that full amount.

The plaintiffs are entitled to judgment and execution for that amount and costs against the debtor husband and the defendant wife, to be applied to their former judgment against the husband. The defendant Campbell does not appear to have any interest in the property, and hence the bill should be dismissed as to him, but without costs.

Decree below reversed. New decree in accordance with this opinion.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Timothy J. HARTNETT

PLUMBER'S SUPPLY ASSOCIATION OF NEW ENGLAND.

(Mass.)

1. The exercise by a private corporation of franchises or privileges not conferred by law may be a serious usurpation and encroachment which, when it injures or puts in hazard the private rights of any person, will justify the exercise by the court of the powers given by Pub. Stat. chap. 180, §§ 17-25, on an information in the nature of a quo warranto.
2. Proceedings to compel persons to pay demands of members of a plumbers' association by threatening to expose their alleged delinquencies and inform certain dealers that they owed overdue accounts and thereby prevent them from obtaining credit in the business which they are carrying on are not germane to the purpose declared by a plumber's supply association "of promoting pleasant relations among its members," or "of establishing and maintaining a place for social meetings," or of "discussing, arbitrating, and settling all matters pertaining to the prosperity and promotion of the jobbing plumbers' supply business."
3. The private rights or interests of a dealer in plumber's supplies are injured or put in hazard by proceedings of an incorporated plumbers' supply association which is not engaged in the trade, and with which he has no dealings or any relation by which its legitimate interests are affected by the question whether he shall have credit in the market, when it officiously and without right assumes to notify sellers of such goods that he has not paid his accounts, and to debar a considerable number of dealers from selling to him upon credit.

NOTE.—For a plumbers' association held lawful, see Macaulay Bros. v. Tierney (R. I.) 87 L. R. A. 455.

As to the annulment of the corporate existence of an organization doing an illegal business, see also People v. Milk Exchange (N. Y.) 27 L. R. A. 437, 88 L. R. A.

4. Written communications stating that a dealer has not paid his accounts and debaring dealers from selling to him upon credit, if not justified, are libelous.

(October 20, 1897.)

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the full bench, after dismissing the proceeding, of a petition for leave to file an information in the nature of a quo warranto to dissolve defendant for having usurped certain franchises. Dismissal reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Sanford H. Dudley, for petitioner:

It will not be contended that the defendant corporation is other than a strictly private corporation, and the rule as to strict construction of its powers must therefore apply to it.

2 Kent, Com. *299; Aug. & A. Corp. § 161; Salem Mill Dam Corp. v. Ropes, 6 Pick. 23; Davis v. Old Colony R. Co. 181 Mass. 259, 41 Am. Rep. 231.

Defendant must confine itself strictly to the purposes and objects for which it was incorporated, and these are, (1) "promoting pleasant relations among its members;" (2), "discussing, arbitrating, and settling all matters pertaining to the prosperity and promotion of the jobbing plumbers' supply business."

Whatever its rights and powers, they are by the express terms of its charter "subject to limitations, duties, and restrictions which by law appertain thereto."

Defendant has usurped powers never contemplated or given by statute, and not given in its charter.

The acts and doings of defendant come very near the "bad debt cases" that have caused so much litigation in many parts of the country. This is not a lawful method of collecting a debt.

A false, or malicious statement with just enough of truth in it to make it worse than false, when coming from one man may not seriously injure even a man in weak credit; but, if coming with all the force and dignity of an official statement of a corporation representing, it may be, all the representative concerns in his line of business, it is likely to crush any man no matter how strong his credit.

The law guards most carefully the credit of all merchants and traders; any imputation of their solvency, any suggestion that they are in pecuniary difficulties, or are attempting to evade the operation of any bankruptcy act is therefore actionable per se.

Messrs. Elder, Wait, & Whitman, for respondent:

No one has a legal right to credit in the purchase of goods; and a refusal to give credit is not an actionable wrong, even if the refusal is in consequence of an agreement among dealers to refuse credit to a particular individual.

The facts of the present cause do not present a case within the purpose and intention of Pub. Stat. chap. 186, §§ 17-25.

That purpose is "to lend the aid of the government in an aggravated case of usurpation and encroachment on private rights by a corporation, by the exercise of a franchise not granted to them;" and the power is "to be exercised only upon extraordinary occasions."

Barker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The statute provisions under which this petition is brought were introduced by Stat. 1851, chap. 233, §§ 53-64, and have been continued in force without much change. See Stat. 1852, chap. 312, §§ 42-50; Gen. Stat. chap. 145, §§ 16-24; Pub. Stat. chap. 186, §§ 17-25. In plain and positive terms, they purport to give relief to any person whose private right or interest has been injured or is put in hazard by the exercise by any private corporation of a franchise or privilege not conferred by law. In the earliest cause in which they were considered, it was said that they conferred upon the court a manifestly high power, to be exercised only upon extraordinary occasions, and in aggravated cases of usurpation and encroachment. See Hastings v. Amherst & B. R. Co. 9 Cush. 596, 599. These views, however, were not repeated or referred to in the succeeding cases of Lechmere Bank v. Boynton, 11 Cush. 369; Boston & P. R. Corp. v. Midland R. Co. 1 Gray, 340, or Goddard v. Smithett, 8 Gray, 116. In the present condition of society, having regard to the actual power of corporations as compared with that of natural persons whose interest they affect, we think that the exercise by a private corporation of franchises or privileges not conferred by law may be a serious usurpation and encroachment, which, when it injures or puts in hazard the private rights of any person, will justify the exercise by this court of the powers given it by the statutes under consideration. In such cases, this explicitly given remedy, like that of the writ of mandamus, should now be "regarded as an ordinary process in cases to which it is applicable." See New England Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Phillips, 141 Mass. 535, 546.

The defendant corporation was chartered under Pub. Stat. chap. 115. The purposes for which it was formed are stated in its charter to be those of "promoting pleasant relations among its members; discussing, arbitrating, and settling all matters pertaining to the prosperity and promotion of the jobbing plumbers' supply business; and establishing and maintaining a place for social meetings." Chapter 115 is entitled "Of Associations for Charitable, Educational, and Other Purposes," and authorizes corporations to be formed for the following purposes only: "For any educational, charitable, benevolent, or religious purpose; for the prosecution of any antiquarian, historical, literary, scientific, medical, artistic, monumental, or musical purposes; for supporting any missionary enterprise having for its object the dissemination of religious or educational instruction in foreign countries; for promoting temperance or morality in this commonwealth; for encouraging athletic exercise or yachting; for encouraging the raising of choice breeds of domestic animals and poultry; for the association and accommodation of societies of Free Masons, Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, or other charitable or social bodies of a like character and purpose; for the establishment and maintenance of places for reading rooms, libraries, or social meetings." Pub. Stat. chap. 115, § 2. The subsequent act authorizing the incorporation of labor or trade organizations (Stat. 1888, chap. 134) for the purpose of improving in any lawful manner the condition of employees in any lawful trade or employment has no bearing upon the present case. The franchises and privileges conferred upon the defendant by law are limited by the purposes enumerated in Pub. Stat. chap. 115, § 2. Business corporations are formed under Pub. Stat. chap. 106, or the other chapters relating to special businesses; and, for such corporations to obtain a charter, a capital stock is required, and there are other prerequisites to the granting of a charter than those required of corporations formed under Pub. Stat. chap. 115.

The report finds that the defendant corporation consists of about twenty firms engaged in selling plumbers' supplies. This means only that its members are persons who are interested in such firms. It takes proceedings against persons whom its members may represent to it as owing them overdue bills for plumber's supplies, sending notices to such persons and also notices to its members other than the creditor. The notice sent by the corporation to the person so alleged to owe an overdue account, after reciting that he has failed to settle the demand, informs him, on behalf of the corporation, that, unless he shall settle the claim within ten days, the members of the corporation will be notified, and that, in consequence, he may be unable to purchase any goods from any of them except for cash before delivery; suggests that, if he has any reason why such notice should not be given, he should immediately present the same to the corporation; and concludes with the threat that inattention to this will bring about the consequences above indicated. The corporation keeps in a book the names of all persons represented to it by its members to be their delinquent debtors, and provides each of its members with a book for the purpose of having the names of such persons entered upon such a book in the possession of each member. After the notice has been sent by the corporation to the alleged debtor, if he does not settle the claim, or present to the corporation some reason for not doing so, the corporation sends to each of its members a formal statement that the alleged debtor's name has been entered on the books of the corporation, and that by its by-laws its members are debarred from selling goods to him except for cash before delivery, until he shall have settled. This statement orders the members of the corporation not to fail to enter the debtor's name in the book provided for that purpose, and states his name and address, the name of his creditor, and the amount of the debt.

That the defendant claims to take such proceedings under its corporate franchises appears from its by-laws, and from the forms which it prepares and uses and sends to its members, to be used in the proceedings. The by-laws make it the duty of all members to report to the secretary any information concerning failures or financial embarrassments in the trade, and "to sell only for cash paid before delivery to customers who have unjustly failed to meet their trade contracts and obligations, and so long as that failure continues." They provide that if a member is involved as defendant in any legal proceeding growing out of his membership, and caused by his obedience to and action under the rules and by-laws of the corporation, the costs and expenses incurred shall be paid out of its funds, if the member places his case in the hands of an attorney approved by its executive committee. There is also a provision that, in cases where the correctness of accounts between members and others is disputed, the creditor shall appoint one arbitrator, the debtor another, and that the two arbitrators shall choose a third, and also that the matter may be referred to its executive committee. The blank forms prepared and issued by the defendant to be used in proceedings against persons represented to it by its members to be their debtors are seven in number. The first is a notice to be sent by the member to the alleged debtor, stating that, unless his past-due account is attended to within ten days, the matter will be referred to the defendant. The second is a notice from the member to the secretary, that the first notice has been sent to the alleged debtor, and that he has not settled the account. The third is the notice from the corporation to the alleged debtor, threatening that, unless he settles the account within ten days, certain consequences will follow. The fourth is a notice to be sent by the member to the secretary that the person subjected to the proceedings has failed to respond to the notice sent him by the corporation, and asking the secretary to notify every member of the facts, according to the by-laws. The fifth is the notice to be sent to the members by the secretary, informing them that the name of the person against whom the proceedings are pending has been entered on the book, and that members are debarred from selling goods to him, except for cash before delivery, until he has settled. The sixth is a notice of settlement to be sent by the member to the secretary, and the seventh is a notice to be sent by the secretary to the members that the person subjected to the proceedings has satisfactorily settled his account, and is again entitled to the same consideration as before. In short, these proceedings against the alleged debtors of its members, instituted by the corporation under the pretended sanction of its corporate franchises, are a method of supplanting the courts by the private machinery of the corporation,—of compelling such persons to pay what its members demand, by means of threatening to expose to certain dealers their alleged delinquencies, by actually informing such dealers that the persons owe over-due accounts, and by preventing such persons from obtaining credit from a number of dealers in goods needed in the business which such persons are carrying on. This private corporation assumes, in the exercise of what it claims to be the corporate privileges conferred by its charter, to require other persons to submit their controversies to arbitration, dictates the terms upon which trade shall be carried on by other persons, and requires other persons, under penalties practically severe, to submit to it their reasons for their conduct in matters with which it has no concern.

A majority of the court are of opinion that the defendant's charter confers upon it no such rights. Such proceedings are not germane to the purpose "of promoting pleasant relations among its members," or of "establishing and maintaining a place for social meetings." The only other purpose stated in the charter is that of "discussing, arbitrating, and settling all matters pertaining to the prosperity and promotion of the jobbing plumbers' supply business." If this language is construed with that which declares the other purposes of the charter, and with our body of corporation statutes, it naturally means the improvement of the plumbers' supply business by the discussion and investigation of scientific and practical matters relating thereto, rather than a purpose to interfere with the actual conduct of the business in particular instances. Such interference would itself be a business enterprise, and would not fall within any of the purposes mentioned in Pub. Stat. chap. 115, § 2, for which alone corporations may be organized under that chapter. Assuming that a corporation might be formed to prosecute the business of collecting debts due to the persons who are members of the defendant corporation, and of protecting them from selling upon credit to irresponsible customers, such a corporation would be a business enterprise, and, to be chartered, must have a capital stock, and must comply with the provisions of Pub. Stat. chap. 106, in order to obtain a legal existence and have corporate rights and privileges.

The right of instituting and conducting such proceedings as those which the defendant assumes to institute is therefore not conferred by law upon it, and their institution and prosecution by its officers in its behalf are corporate acts, constituting the usurpation of corporate powers and privileges, some of which are granted only to courts or other public tribunals, and others of which would never be granted by a legislature.

The remaining question is whether any private right or interest of the petitioner has been injured or put in hazard by the defendant's exercise of this usurped franchise or privilege. It is to be noticed that the hearing upon which the petition was ordered to be dismissed was the summary hearing provided for by Pub. Stat. chap. 186, § 19, at which, "if there appears probable cause to believe that the party complained of has exercised a franchise or privilege not conferred by law, and that thereby the private right or interest of the complainant has been injured or is put in hazard, leave shall be granted to file the information," and that judgment that the corporation be excluded from such franchise or privilege can be rendered only after hearing upon the information. Id. § 23. The report states that at the hearing there was not much dispute as to any questions of facts, and we infer that, as alleged in the petition, the petitioner is a plumber, having occasion to use his credit in conducting that business; that in the course of his business he became indebted to a dealer in plumbers' supplies, who was a member of the defendant corporation; that a portion of the balance claimed by his creditor to be due was in dispute; and that while a suit to recover such balance was pending, in which he had given security by a bond to dissolve the attachment, the corporation instituted proceedings against him, under its by-laws, and notified its members that his name had been entered upon its book, and that its members were debarred from selling goods to him, except for cash before delivery, until he should have settled with the member to whom he was so said to be indebted. The report further states that it did not seem to the presiding justice that any right of the petitioner was infringed by the defendant's mode of procedure, and the petition was dismissed, with costs. In the opinion of a majority of the court, this conclusion was wrong. Without examining all the ways in which the defendant's mode of procedure may have injured or put in hazard the petitioner's private rights or interests, we think that they were injured or put in hazard. The credit of a tradesman is an important and often his most considerable resource, and he has a right to rely upon and to use it in endeavoring to do business. No one has the right to attempt to destroy or to injure his credit, unless the person so attempting can show that his own legitimate interests require such action. Assuming that the legitimate interests of sellers of plumbers' supplies may justify such persons in informing each other that a customer of one of them has not paid for his purchases, and in agreeing with each other to sell him no goods except for cash paid before delivery, the defendant has no such justification for its interference with the petitioner's business. The defendant is a legal person other than and distinct from its members. It is not a seller of plumbers' supplies, and has no interest in that market, and no legitimate concern with the question of who shall purchase in that market upon credit. When, without being engaged in the trade, or being in any relation by which its legitimate interests are affected by the question whether the petitioner shall have credit in that market, the defendant assumes to notify sellers of such goods that he has not paid his accounts, and to debar a considerable number of dealers from selling to him upon credit, the petitioner's right to an open market, and to proffer his credit without officious interference from persons who have no legitimate interest in the question whether he shall buy upon credit, is injured and put in hazard.

Again, one of the petitioner's private rights is that he shall not be libeled in his business or trade. Under the defendant's mode of procedure, the corporation having, as a distinct legal person, no interest in the trade, nor in the dispute between the purchaser and its member, there is no privilege to justify the communication to it or by it of the facts which it assumes to communicate. Such written communications tend to injure the purchaser in his business, and, if not justified, may be libels, which injure him in his private rights, or put them in hazard, within the meaning of the statute, besides being actionable torts. See Odgers, Libel & Slander, 3d ed. 86, 87, and cases cited; Capital & Counties Bank v. Henty, L. R. 7 App. Cas. 741. The statements concerning the petitioner published by the defendant to its members were calculated to convey to them imputations upon the petitioner injurious to him in his business, and were not made in the discharge of any public or private duty, legal or moral, in the conduct of the defendant's own legitimate affairs, in matters in which its own legitimate interests were concerned. In the whole procedure, the defendant acts officiously and without right, having itself no interest in the matters about which it publishes statements calculated to injure in their business persons who are not its members, and with whom it has no business or other relations save those which it usurps. We think, therefore, that, upon the report, there appears probable cause to believe that the defendant has exercised a franchise or privilege not conferred by law, and that thereby the petitioner's private right or interest has been injured or is put in hazard, and that leave should be granted him to file an information.

This makes it necessary to reverse the decree dismissing the petition. So ordered.

Allen, Knowlton, and Lathrop, JJ., do not concur in the result reached by the majority of the court.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

James O. MURFIN

v.

DETROIT & ERIN PLANK ROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

Tolls for the use of a road by persons riding bicycles cannot be charged under How. Stat. § 3682, allowing a charge of 2 cents per mile for "any vehicle or carriage drawn by two animals" and 1 cent per mile for every vehicle or carriage "drawn by one animal," as well as for "every horse and rider or led horse."

(July 13, 1897.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged illegal stopping of plaintiff while traveling on defendant's road. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Gray & Gray, for plaintiff in error:

So long as the turnpike is maintained, the highway authorities have no control of the road, nor duty to repair, nor responsibility for defective conditions.

The right to exact toll is derived from legislative grant, which usually prescribes the rates of toll.

A bicycle is included in the term "carriage" or "vehicle."

Myers v. Hinds (Mich.) 98 L. R. A. 856.

A bicycle driven by a man is a "vehicle drawn by one animal."

The legislature intended to prescribe toll for all vehicles and all animals naturally using the roadway, and not the sidewalk.

The bicycle is a new kind of vehicle, but as invention proceeds it is held that highways become subject to new styles of locomotion.

Macomber v. Nichols, 84 Mich. 212, 22 Am. Rep. 522; Detroit City R. Co. v. Mills, 85 Mich. 634.

It is a vehicle, however, and its natural place is on the street.

The use of the bicycle has largely reduced the travel by horse and carriage and in that sense has impaired the collection of tolls by the companies, and thus impaired the rights of the company within the rule of Detroit & B. Pl. Road Co. v. Detroit Suburban R. Co. 103 Mich. 585.

The legislature intended to tax all carriages, even those thereafter coming into common use, though propelled by other agency than a horse.

urban R. Co. 103 Mich. 585; Geiger v. Perkiomen & R. Turnp. Road, 167 Pa. 582, 28 L. R. A. 454.

Messrs. Griffin, Clark, & Russell, for defendant in error:

The right to demand toll is almost universally granted by statutory enactments, and can be exercised only in strict compliance with the terms of the grant.

Angell, Highways, § 357.

If there be any ambiguity in the language of such grant, it will be construed rather in favor of the public rather than of the grantee.

Angell, Highways, § 357; Barrett v. Stockton & D. R. Co. 2 Mann. & G. 184.

Clauses in statutes conferring an exemption from the payment of toll are construed most liberally in favor of the immunity.

Angell, Highways, § 359; Middlesex Turnp. Co. v. Freeman, 14 Conn. 85; Proprietors of Stourbridge Canal v. Wheeley, 2 Barn. & Ad. 792.

The question of bicycle tolls has been presented to the higher courts only in the cases of:

Section 3592 is also a penal statute; and therefore cannot be extended by construction beyond the plain meaning of its terms.

Carver v. Detroit & S. Pl. Road Co. 61 Mich. 588; Leoni Trp. v. Taylor, 20 Mich. 148; Perry v. Cheboygan, 55 Mich. 250; Detroit v. Putnam, 45 Mich. 263; Shaw v. Clark, 49 Mich. 384, 48 Am. Rep. 474; Wallace v. Finch, 24 Mich. 255.

A highway established for the general benefit of passage and traffic must admit of new methods of use whenever it is found that the general benefit requires them; and if the laws should preclude the adaptation of the use to the new methods, it would defeat, in greater or less degree, the purpose for which highways are established.

Macomber v. Nichols, 34 Mich. 212, 22 Am. Rep. 522.

Hooker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought against a toll road company for stopping the plaintiff at defendant's toll gate and preventing him from proceeding to ride a bicycle upon its road without the payment of toll. The defendant appeals from a directed verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

The only question submitted is that of the right of the defendant to charge toll for the use of its road by persons riding bicycles.

The rights of the defendant are statutory, and its right to charge toll is to be determined by § 3562 of Howell's Statutes, viz.: "Whenever any such company shall have completed their road, or any 5 consecutive miles thereof, the directors thereof may erect toll gates and exact tolls from persons traveling on their road, for so much as may be completed, at a rate not exceeding 2 cents per mile, for any vehicle or carriage drawn by two animals, and 1 cent per mile for every sled or sleigh so drawn, and if drawn by more than two animals $\frac{1}{4}$ of a cent per mile for every additional animal; for every vehicle, sled, sleigh or carriage drawn by one animal, 1 cent a mile; for every score of sheep or swine, half a cent a mile; for every score of neat cattle, 2 cents a mile; and for every horse and rider, or led horse, 1 cent a mile; such toll-gates so to be erected by such company, may be as many in number, and located at such points as such company may deem necessary."

If we could construe this statute as giving a right to collect tolls from all persons who travel the road, there would be but little difficulty in holding that bicycles, which we held to be vehicles in Myers v. Hinds (Mich.) 33 L. R. A. 356, are subject to toll, for we may take judicial notice that a good highway is as essential to their use as to that of any other vehicle. There is nothing in this act that gives the right to charge toll against pedestrians, and we have never heard it claimed that such charges were made. Nor have we known of toll being charged for wheelbarrows or cars or handsleds, or baby carriages propelled by human agency; though a good road is as essential to these as to bicycles. If this question arose with reference to a four-wheeled vehicle, propelled by steam or electricity, there would probably be little doubt of the right to charge and collect toll. It would seem to be covered by the case of Detroit & B. Pl. Road Co. v. Detroit Suburban R. Co. 103 Mich. 587, where it was held that the rights acquired under this act forbid the use of the highway for purposes inconsistent with the rights and franchises of the plank-road company. The use of two wheels instead of four, if propelled by a motor, as they are liable any day to be, would hardly suffice to distinguish them from the heavier and more cumbersome vehicle, and we hesitate to say that the courts could, with propriety, hold that a motor cycle could escape tolls under this statute, notwithstanding the fact that only vehicles drawn by animals are mentioned in the act.

We think, however, that a distinction may be made between vehicles propelled by man and those depending upon animal power or mechanical motors for propulsion, and that this would not do violence to the act, which has always been construed to permit the use of highways by persons who did not depend upon some means of conveyance besides their own powers of locomotion. The bicycle of to-day is propelled and managed by the feet and hands of the rider. It uses the traveled roadway only when it is the better part of the highway, and the pedestrian does the same. The projected electric railroad, involved in the case of Detroit & B. Pl. Road Co. v. Detroit Suburban R. Co. was not expected to use the roadway constructed by the plank road company, but one to be built for its exclusive use, and one adapted to no other kind of vehicle.

It seems reasonable to say, therefore, that the case cannot be allowed to turn simply on the question whether the defendant's roadway is likely to be used by the bicycle, as that is not the controlling factor in the case of the electric road which is forbidden, or the pedestrian who is not forbidden, to travel any part of the road without paying toll.

The bicycle is not subject to the payment of toll by the strict letter of the act. Neither is the motor cycle, yet we incline to the opinion that payment of toll by the driver of the latter is within the spirit, while such payment by the user of the former is not, because of the apparent intention to confine the payment of toll to those who do not depend upon their own powers of locomotion for the propulsion of the vehicle used. This view seems to receive significant support in the fact that we find few cases where the question has arisen. The bicycle has been used as a road machine for a quarter of a century, and we cannot conceive of the users submitting to a general practice of charging toll without protest, that would have led to an adjudication of the question. Furthermore, we have never heard that it was the practice of the companies to charge toll, and we have reason to believe that this company is no exception, but that the cause is here to ascertain whether the company may safely provide exceptional facilities for wheelmen, with the expectation of collecting toll. But two cases where similar questions have arisen are cited by counsel. In Geiger v. Perkiomen & R. Turnp. Road, 167 Pa. 583, 28 L. R. A. 458, a bicycle was held subject to toll, as a two-wheeled carriage, under a statute which gave the right to collect toll from "all and every person and persons using the said road . . . and to stop any person driving any . . . sulky, chair, chaise, phaeton, cart, wagon, wain, sleigh, sled or other carriage of burthen or pleasure . . . for every other carriage of pleasure under whatever name it may go, the like sums according to the number of wheels and horses drawing the same." The court held that this was a carriage of burthen or pleasure, and what is more significant from the standpoint from which we view the case, is the view taken of the word "horses" as used in the statute. It is said that "the method of computation by wheels and horses is not the power to collect toll, which is expressly given; that is a mere limitation to the power; the demand must not exceed the sums specified for the animals and vehicles enumerated." This reasoning is at variance with our view, and it seems to us that it is at variance with immunity from tolls, on the part of the pedestrian, who, as is said of the bicyclist, in that case, "has the same right as owners of carriages, to insist that the highway shall be maintained in a reasonably safe condition of repair." A Pennsylvania statute is cited giving the bicyclist the right to use the highway, the same as any other vehicle, but we think it was declaratory of the common law merely, and if it were not it could hardly be held to affect the rights of a turnpike company, under a charter granted half a century before practical bicycles were invented.

This question arose in England under a statute which gave the right to collect tolls as follows:

"For every horse, mule, or other beast drawing any coach, sociable, chariot, berlin, landau, vis-a-vis, barouche, phaeton, curricule, calash, chaise, chair, gig, whiskv, caravan, hearse, litter, or other such carriage, the sum of 6d.

"For every horse, mule, or ass, laden or unladen, and not drawing, the sum of 2d.; and "For every carriage of whatever description, and for whatever purpose, which should be drawn or impelled, or set or kept in motion by steam or any other power or agency than being drawn by any horse or horses, or other beast or beasts of draught, any sum not exceeding 5s." Williams v. Ellis, L. R. 5 Q. B. Div. 176.

In a short opinion the court held that a bicycle is not a carriage within the meaning of the turnpike act; that carriages there referred to must be carriages ejusdem generis, with the carriages previously specified, which, as the act imports, were carriages propelled otherwise than by human agency. We should hesitate to say that the right to charge tolls was limited to conveyances ejusdem generis, with those drawn by animals which alone seem to be mentioned in our act. Indeed, the case cited from 108 Michigan may be plausibly said to have settled that question; but we see no reason for refusing to apply the doctrine to the broader class of vehicles, propelled by animals or some mechanical motor. It seems to us that this distinction will protect the plank road companies from a use of their road by substitutes for those vehicles which the law contemplated should be charged for, and at the same time protect the pedestrian in his increased power of locomotion by the aid of the wheel.

This view accords with that of the learned circuit judge who tried the cause, and his judgment is affirmed.

Moore, J., concurred. Long, Ch. J., and Grant and Montgomery, JJ., concurred in the result.

Messrs. Butterfield & Keeney also for appellee.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainant is the successor of the firm of O. & W. Thum, who were manufacturers of sticky fly paper. It filed a bill of complaint to restrain defendant communicating to others the secret processes and methods, and the knowledge of secret machinery, which were learned by him while in the employ of O. & W. Thum. The court below granted an injunction, as prayed in the bill of complaint. Defendant appeals.

The testimony is voluminous, and very conflicting. We are satisfied, however, that it establishes, by a very clear preponderance, as follows: The defendant entered the employ of O. & W. Thum in 1887. They at that time were manufacturing sticky fly paper by machinery, and from formulæ known only to themselves. They at that time had but one man and one boy in their employ. The business was carried on in the attic of the house, and in a small building in the back yard. The processes and machinery that were regarded as secret, and of great value to the firm, were used only by the members of the firm. As the business grew, it became necessary to employ more persons, and among others employed was the defendant. Because of the increase in the business and the employment of more persons, other precautions were taken, as the necessity grew for taking them. The public were excluded from the premises. The employees at one machine were not allowed to inspect other machines used in the manufacture, and were not allowed to visit all portions of the premises. Very rigid and careful requirements were made and enforced to guard the formulæ, the processes of manufacture, and knowledge of the machinery used, so that no one could learn them, or either of them, to the detriment of the firm. The business of the firm steadily grew in magnitude, so that when defendant left its employ, in 1892, about $100,000 was invested in the business, and a large number of persons were given employment. Shortly before this bill was filed, complainant received the following letter:

"Grand Rapids, Mich., Jan. 7, 1893.

The O. & W. Thum Co., City.

Mr. Wm. Thum—Dear Sir: It is about fifteen months since I left your shops, and during that time have been more or less troubled by outside people in regards to fly paper and its manipulations at your works; not so much so until lately, when there were representatives from two large firms, one from Ohio, which was represented by the president and their attorney, which I looked up in G. R. Dun's, who quote them at $500,000, who were here for one week, and were directed by some people here in the city to me. They told me that they had sufficient artillery to put the paper on the market, but were a little short on cavalry in its workings; also told me that they were ready at any time to make arrangements,—that is, as soon as I say yes. I can show letters from the above firm and others. I have not said a single word of its manufacture since I left you, but do not think it's my place to keep mum unless your desire it. Awaiting your early reply,

I remain, yours truly,

A. A. Tloczynski.

It very soon became evident that defendant was negotiating with others to engage in the manufacture of the same product the complainants were making, and this bill was filed.

The terms of employment were not reduced to writing, and there is a sharp conflict of testimony between the defendant and O. & W. Thum as to the terms of his employment, so that it becomes necessary to consider carefully all the testimony in the case to arrive at the truth. One cannot read all the testimony, in the light of the facts and circumstances surrounding the condition of the business at the commencement of the defendant's employment, and its subsequent development and growth, without coming to the conclusion that the defendant and his employer regarded his relation to them as a confidential one, and that he should not disclose or make improper use of the secrets of the business. The conclusion is irresistible that defendant would not have been employed, and information which was imparted to him would not have been conveyed, if it had been understood that he might sever his relations with his employers at any time, and sell the valuable information which had been imparted to him whenever he could find a market. The inception, growth, and development of the business; the manner in which it was conducted; the care taken to exclude the public from means of obtaining knowledge of the processes; the fact that, when new machinery was to be constructed, part of it was got at one place, and part at another, so that no person outside of the members of the firm and their immediate employees should see a completed machine in operation; the fact that employees in one department of the manufactory were not allowed in other departments; and the care which was taken to prevent employees from obtaining knowledge of any branch of the business, except that in which the employee was immediately engaged, of all of which the defendant had knowledge,—all indicate conclusively that the business and processes were secret, and that no one knew that fact better than the defendant. We think it clearly established by the testimony that the employment was upon the agreement that defendant would not use the information imparted to him to the harm of his employer.

In our view, the only important question involved in the case is whether an employee, when his employment terminates, may make use of secrets confided to him by his employer, necessary to be confided to him in the conduct of the business, when it is understood and agreed that he shall not make use of the secret knowledge so imparted to the detriment of the employer, and, if he attempts so to do, may he be restrained by writ of injunction?

It is said by counsel that the remedy by injunction will not be granted in such a case as this, where, from the nature of the subject, there could be no decree for a specific performance; citing Newbery v. James, 2 Meriv. 446; Williams v. Williams, 8 Meriv. 157; Kimberley v. Jennings, 6 Sim. 340.

It is also said that a decree for a specific performance will not be granted where the court has not the means of seeing that its decree shall be carried out; citing Voorthuis v. Friebe, 25 Mich. 493, 12 Am. Rep. 291; Blanchard v. Detroit, L. & L. M. R. Co. 31 Mich. 43, 18 Am. Rep. 142; Bumpus v. Bumpus, 53 Mich. 346. An examination of the Michigan cases cited shows that in those cases the court was asked to decree the performance of an affirmative act, where the agreement was of an indefinite and uncertain character, instead of being asked to enforce a definite agreement not to do an act. As to the other cases, if they tend to sustain the contention of the defendant, they are contrary to the great weight of authority. Is it not true that, if one discovers a process of manufacture or an invention which is of use to individuals and the community, he has a property right in it, and that an agreement which must be respected may be made in relation to keeping the process of manufacture or the invention a secret between the discoverer or owner and an employee, which agreement is made one of the conditions of the employment? It has been said by a very able justice: "If he invents or discovers, and keeps secret, a process of manufacture, whether a proper subject for a patent or not, he has not indeed an exclusive right to it as against the public, or against those who in good faith acquire knowledge of it; but he has a property in it, which a court of chancery will protect against one who in violation of contract and breach of confidence undertakes to apply it to his own use, or to disclose it to third persons. Peabody v. Norfolk, 98 Mass. 452, 96 Am. Dec. 664." And, again, Mr. Justice Gray, who delivers the opinion, says: "In this court it is settled that a secret art is a legal subject of property, and that a bond for a conveyance of the exclusive right to it is not open to the objection of being in restraint of trade, but may be enforced by action at law, and requires the obligor not to divulge the secret to any other person. Vickery v. Welch, 19 Pick. 523; Taylor v. Blanchard, 13 Allen, 378, 374, 90 Am. Dec. 208. In Jarvis v. Peck, 10 Paige, 118, such a bond was held valid in equity." In Salomon v. Hertz, 40 N. J. Eq. 400, the court adopts the language of Justice Gray, and holds that there is a property in a secret process of manufacture. Simmons Hardware Co. v. Weibel, 1 S. D. 488, 11 L. R. A. 267.

A recent and instructive case is that of Eastman Co. v. Reichenbach, 47 N. Y. S. R. 435. "To briefly summarize, then, the established facts of this case, it appears that the plaintiff is the owner of valuable trade secrets, which were either discovered by one or more of the defendants or necessarily disclosed to them while occupying a confidential relation towards the plaintiff; that as to such trade secrets as were discovered by either Reichenbach or Passavant they have undertaken and agreed to give plaintiff the exclusive property in and control over the same; and that, in violation of this agreement, they are now proposing to make use of them, or some of them, in such a manner as to materially injure the plaintiff's business. With these facts established, the application of the legal principles which must govern the disposition of the case does not appear to be a very formidable undertaking. It may be safely assumed at the outset, I think, that whatever remedy plaintiff may have does not reside in a court of law. The very nature of the case, the peculiar character of the injury liable to be inflicted, and the incalculable damages which may possibly result, all show most conclusively that legal relief is totally inadequate for plaintiff's protection, and that its only resort must be to a court of equity. The learned counsel for defendants has contended, with all the adroitness and skill at his command, which is but another way of saying that such contention has been put forth with all possible adroitness and skill, that this case is not one of which a court of equity can take jurisdiction, and several authorities, of both English and American courts are cited in support of this claim. I am constrained, however, to hold that the weight of authority is opposed to his view of the law. The question presented is an interesting one, and would justify a somewhat analytical review of the cases which bear upon either aspect of it, did time permit; but for the purposes of this adjudication it will be necessary to advert to such only as are deemed conclusive upon this court. In Morison v. Moat, 9 Hare, 241, which is an English case, it was held that an injunction would issue to restrain the use of a secret in the compounding of a medicine, not being the subject of a patent, and to restrain the sale of such medicine by a party who acquired knowledge of the secret in violation of the contract of the party by whom it was communicated, and in breach of trust and confidence. An appeal was taken from the decision of the vice chancellor, and in 1852 the case was affirmed by the court of chancery, and it was there held that 'there is no doubt whatever that where a party who has a secret in trade employs persons under contract, either express or implied, or under duty, express or implied, those persons cannot gain knowledge of that secret and then set it up against their employers.' Morison v. Moat, 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 248. In 1868 the supreme court of Massachusetts recognized and followed the authority of Morison v. Moat, and in the opinion of Gray, J., the law is thus stated: If a party 'invents or discovers, and keeps secret, a process of manufacture, whether a proper subject for a patent or not, he has not indeed an exclusive right to it as against the public, or against those who in good faith acquire knowledge of it; but he has a property in it, which a court of chancery will protect, against one who in violation of contract and breach of confidence undertakes to apply it to his own use, or to disclose it to third persons. The jurisdiction in equity to interfere by injunction to prevent such a breach of trust, when the injury would be irreparable and the remedy at law inadequate, is well established by authority.' Peabody v. Norfolk, 93 Mass. 452, 96 Am. Dec. 664. The language above quoted was cited with approval in Salomon v. Hertz, 40 N. J. Eq. 400, and it is almost identical with that employed by elementary writers of recognized standing in discussing the same question. Judge Story says: 'Courts of equity will restrain a party from making a disclosure of secrets communicated to him in the course of a confidential employment, and it matters not in such cases whether the secrets be secrets of trade, or secrets of title, or any other secrets of the party important to his interests. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §52. See also 1 High, Inj. 2d ed. p. 15. The same doctrine has obtained in this state for at least half a century, and has been enunciated by a line of decisions which, with a single exception, is unbroken. Jarvis v. Peck, 10 Paige, 118; Hammer v. Barns, 26 How. Pr. 174; Champlin v. Stoddart, 80 Hun, 300; Tabor v. Hoffman, 118 N. Y. 30. The Champlin Case was decided by the general term of this department, Smith, P. J., writing the opinion, in the course of which he takes occasion to say that 'a secret of trade is fully recognized in equity as property . . . the disclosure of which will be restrained by injunction.' By a careful reading of the various decisions upon this subject, it will be seen that some are made to depend upon a breach of an express contract between the parties, while others proceed upon the theory that where a confidential relation exists between two or more parties engaged in a business venture, the law raises an implied contract between them that the employee will not divulge any trade secrets imparted to him or discovered by him in the course of his employment, and that a disclosure of such secrets, thus acquired, is a breach of trust, and a violation of good morals, to prevent which a court of equity should intervene. It may also be observed in this connection that the word 'property,' as applied to trade secrets and inventions, has its limitations, for it is undoubtedly true that when an article manufactured by some secret process, which is not the subject of a patent, is thrown upon the market, the whole world is at liberty to discover, if it can by any fair means, what that process is, and, when discovery is thus made, to employ it in the manufacture of similar articles. In such a case, the inventor's or manufacturer's property in his process is gone; but the authorities all hold that, while knowledge obtained in this manner is perfectly legitimate, that which is obtained by means of any breach of confidence cannot be sanctioned; and this distinction is quite forcibly presented in a recent decision of the court of appeals, to which the attention of this court has been directed by the supplemental brief of defendant's counsel. Judge Landon, in his opinion, speaking of the plaintiff's claim, says: 'His case is unlike those in which the injunctive process of the court is sought to restrain the disclosure of a secret, or the publication of a letter, which may prove injurious to business or character.' Bristol v. Equitable L. Assur. Soc. 182 N. Y. 264-267. But without multiplying citations or prolonging consideration of the legal aspect of this case, it may be said by way of conclusion that the principle contended for by the plaintiff is not only abundantly supported by authority, but is likewise founded in good common sense, and is peculiarly applicable to the case in hand. Here is a party which, by the expenditure of vast sums of money, and the exercise of much skill and ingenuity, has built up a large and prosperous business, the capital of which consists largely in certain inventions and discoveries made by its officers, servants, and agents. The world at large knows nothing of these inventions and discoveries, because they are locked within the brains of those who conceived them. The defendants, who have been largely instrumental in perfecting them, while under both an express and implied contract to give the plaintiff the benefit of their inventive genius, propose now to disregard their legal and moral obligations by creating a new establishment where these inventions and discoveries may be employed to plaintiff's serious injury. This is not legitimate competition, which it is always the policy of the law to foster and encourage, but it is contra bonos mores, and constitutes a breach of trust which a court of law, and much less a court of equity, should not tolerate." Fralich v. Despar, 165 Pa. 24.

It is argued in this case that there is no express contract shown, and that an implied contract is not such a one as will be enforced. We think the testimony discloses very clearly an express agreement between the employer and the employed, but, if it may be stated that the only agreement is an implied one, growing out of oral statements taken in connection with the facts and circumstances surrounding the business, the parties, and their acts, still, if it is clearly established by all that was said and done that the secrets confided to the defendant were not to be disclosed by him to others, and were not to be used by him except when he was in the employment of those who imparted to him the secret, or their legal representatives, and that was one of the conditions of his employment, we do not think it would make any difference in the principle involved. The knowledge came to him in the course of a confidential employment, relying upon his using the knowledge only for the benefit of the employer. It is said by an eminent writer: "On the whole, the doctrine may be generally stated that wherever confidence is reposed, and one party has it in his power, in a secret manner, for his own advantage, to sacrifice those interests which he is bound to protect, he will not be permitted to hold any such advantage." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 523. The same authority, when discussing the subject of in what cases injunction will be issued, says: "Upon similar grounds of irreparable mischief courts of equity will restrain a party from making a disclosure of secrets communicated to him in the course of a confidential employment. And it matters not in such cases whether the secrets be secrets of trade, or secrets of title, or any other secrets of the party important to his interests." Thus a party has been restrained from using the secret of compounding a medicine not protected by patent, when it appeared that the secret was imparted to him, to his own knowledge, in breach of faith or contract on the part of the persons communicating it. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 953, and many cases there cited. 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 949; High, Inj. § 19; Davies v. Clough, 8 Sim. 262; Williams v. Prince of Wales Life etc. Assur. Co. 23 Beav. 388; Morison v. Moat, 9 Hare, 241; Yovatt v. Winyard, 1 Jac. & W. 394; Tipping v. Clarke, 2 Hare, 398; Penbody v. Norfolk, 98 Mass. 452, 96 Am. Dec. 664; Champlin v. Stoddart, 80 Hun, 300; Silamon v. Herts, 40 N. J. Eq. 400.

The case of Little v. Gallus, 4 App. Div. 569, is against the contention of the defendant. In that case the plaintiff was a maker of typewriter ribbons by secret processes and formulæ. The defendants entered his employ when they were minors. The court says: "It seems, therefore, too plain for controversy that the plaintiff was the owner of a process or invention which possessed great value and which he had secured at the cost of much time, trouble, and expense; that the defendants Gallus and Bostwick, occupying a confidential relation toward the plaintiff, gained a knowledge of the processes and formulæ employed by him in conducting his business; that they well understood the nature of the business, their relations to it, and the care which was used to keep the same secret; and that notwithstanding the knowledge thus obtained, and in violation of the faith and confidence reposed in them, they surreptitiously made memoranda of these formulae, and are now using the same, as well as all other knowledge obtained while in the plaintiff's service, to start and operate a rival establishment. The only question, therefore, to be determined upon this state of facts, is whether or not they shall be permitted to carry out their intentions. It is contended by the plaintiff that his case is brought directly within the rule laid down in that of Eastman Kodak Co. v. Reichenbach, 79 Hun, 188, recently decided by the general term in the fifth department. And the defendants, while conceding that the law of the case is there correctly stated, insist that the facts do not warrant its application here. We find ourselves unable to concur in the view thus taken and which was carefully elaborated upon the argument by the learned counsel for the defendants. The facts of this case differ somewhat from those of the Reichenbach Case, in that there was no written agreement entered into between these parties by which the employees undertook to give to their employers exclusive right in, or control over, any inventions discovered by, or disclosed to, the former; but we are unable to see how this strengthens the defendants' contention. In the case cited there happens to be an express contract, but nevertheless it is asserted in the opinion of the court, and such is unquestionably the correct rule, that the law raises an implied contract that an employee who occupies a confidential relation towards his employer will not divulge any trade secrets imparted to him or discovered by him in the course of his employment; and we do not see why the defendants, Gallus and Bostwick, are not under just as strong an obligation to observe and keep sacred the trust reposed in them as they would be had they reduced the contract which the law implies to writing; nor does the fact that they entered the plaintiff's service while minors and at first performed duties comparatively unimportant in their character relieve them from a faithful observance of their obligation. Gallus, at least, was ultimately advanced to a position of great responsibility, and both of them had attained their majority before attempting to take improper advantage of the knowledge imparted to them while in the plaintiff's employ, and their present experiments are not in the direction of legitimate competition, but involve a breach of trust which we think the court should prevent." Tabor v. Hoffman, 118 N. Y. 81; Tuck v. Priester, L. R. 19 Q. B. Div. 619; Pollard v. Photographic Co. L. R. 40 Ch. Div. 845.

It is the contention of the defendant that the contract sought to be enforced is void as against public policy because it is in restraint of trade, citing Richardson v. Ruhl, 77 Mich. 632, 6 L. R. A. 457; Western Wooden Ware Assn. v. Starkey, 84 Mich. 76, 11 L. R. A. 503. These cases are not in point. They are cases where the purpose of the contract was to create a monopoly by providing by contract that established industries should cease to do business, which, of course, is unlawful; but that is not the purpose of the contract under consideration. Here processes and machinery have been invented which the owners believe would be of great value to them if they could be used upon a large scale. To use them upon a large scale required the employment of a number of persons, to some of whom some of the secrets of the business and the machinery must be disclosed. If these secrets were disclosed to others, who might use them to establish a business of like character, they would cease to be valuable to the owner. Is there anything unreasonable in enforcing an agreement that such secrets shall not be disclosed by the employee? It has been repeatedly held that contracts for the exclusive use of a secret art are not in restraint of trade, for the public has no right to the secret. See Taylor v. Blanchard, 18 Allen, 372, 90 Am. Dec. 203, and cases cited; Leather Cloth Co. v. Lonsont, L. R. 9 Eq. 345. We cannot see how it can be against public interest to allow an employer to make such conditions of employment with his employees as will give him the fullest protection to his property right in his process or invention, and at the same time enable him to employ a great many employees in its production. To enable one to do this would be a benefit to the public in many ways. It would secure employment to more persons than would otherwise be employed, and a larger output would be made of a useful article. The evidence discloses that it does not require a man of special skill to do the work done by defendant when in the employ of the predecessors in business of the complainants. To restrain him from making use of what he has not discovered is not an injustice to him, and does not abridge his right to work along those lines which would not be harmful to those to whom he has sustained a position of confidence. It is to the advantage of both parties that such a contract should be allowed. By means of it the defendant secured employment which he could not have secured without it, and at the same time his employers were secured against competition which might be ruinous. Beal v. Chase, 31 Mich. 531.

Long, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was in trespass, commenced in justice court, where judgment was given for defendants. On the trial in the circuit the court directed the verdict in favor of the defendants. The declaration was in writing, and substantially avers that the defendants on the 15th day of April, 1895, "with force and arms the close of said plaintiff, situate in the town of Brownstown, said county, and known and described as being 'Horse Island,' being situate directly east of sections one and twelve in township 5 south, of range 10 east, with the adjacent shore, broke and entered, with their feet in walking, shooting at game on said plaintiff's land, and within a short distance of the same a marsh flowed by water yet adjacent to the main shore of which his said lands above described are a part; and while in the act of so shooting game aforesaid trod down with their feet in so walking and hunting game, and with their boats and decoys crowded onto the grounds, anchored, trod down and trampled upon and destroyed the grass of said plaintiff there growing, and other injuries to him then and there did," etc. The plea was the general issue, with notice that no trespass was committed. The plaintiff gave evidence tending to show that he was the owner in fee of the island. There was offered and received in evidence a patent from the United States to Benjamin Hall, Jr., the land being described therein as "Horse Island, being situate directly east of sections 1 and 12 in township 5 south, 10 east, as per plat approved April 2, 1885." Also a deed from Benjamin Hall, Jr., and wife to plaintiff, describing the same premises. Plaintiff further showed that he was in possession of the property at the time of the trespass complained of, and that he and his grantor had been in possession for many years. This island is situate in the Detroit river, the center of the river being east of the island and the main shore west of it. On April 15, 1895, the defendants came in a boat to a place near the north end of the island and about 60 feet from it, and about 216 feet from the channel bank, threw out their decoys, and commenced shooting ducks. They were warned off by plaintiff's agent, but refused to go. At the place where the boat was anchored the water was about 10 or 12 inches deep on that day. It was shown that at some times in the season this place was not covered with water at all, but at the time in question the water from the upland of the island to that point was from 6 to 12 inches deep, growing gradually deeper as the channel bank was approached. This land between the island and the channel bank is a shallow flat, and during some seasons of the year is covered with weeds, rushes, and grass as high as a man's head. This marsh extends all around the island, though there is a slight current passing through it. Plaintiff on the trial asked for nominal damages, which request was refused.

It is well settled in this state that the fee to the land under the waters of the rivers, as far as the middle thread, is in the riparian owner. In Grand Rapids v. Powers, 89 Mich. 94, 14 L. R. A. 498, the cases upon the subject are collected and the question discussed at such length that it is needless to cite or discuss them here. Among other things, it was there said: "Under the settled law of this state, the defendant is the owner, by virtue of his riparian rights, of the soil of the river bed to the middle of the stream." In that case Mr. Justice Morse quoted with approval from the case of Janesville v. Carpenier, 77 Wis. 288, 8 L. R. A. 808, as follows: "That . . . the owner in fee of this ground has the right to use and enjoy it to the center of the river in any manner not injurious to others and subject to the public right of navigation, has been too often decided by this court and other courts to be questioned. As a riparian owner of the land adjacent to the water, he owns the bed of the river usque ad filum aquæ, subject to the public easement if it be navigable in fact, and with due regard to the rights of the riparian proprietors. He may construct docks, landing places, piers, and wharves out to navigable waters if the river is navigable in fact, and if it is not so navigable he may construct anything he pleases to the thread of the stream, unless it injures some other riparian proprietor or those having the superior right to use the waters for hydraulic purposes. . . . Subject to these restrictions, he has the right to use his land under water the same as above water. It is his private property under the protection of the Constitution, and it cannot be taken, or its value lessened or impaired, even for public use, 'without compensation' or 'without due process of law,' and it cannot be taken at all for anyone's private use." Judge Morse added: "The law of this state is in complete accord and harmony with that of our sister state of Wisconsin in respect to riparian rights." In Webber v. Pere Marquette Boom Co. 62 Mich. 626, it was said: "It is the settled rule in this state that the title of the riparian owner extends to the middle line of the lake or stream of the inland waters" (citing many cases). And again: "This has become a rule of property in this state, and the Supreme Court [of the United States] recognizes the right of each state to determine the doctrine for itself." Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324, 24 L. ed. 224.

It is not claimed in the present case that the public can be hindered or in any manner interrupted in its use of the Detroit river for the purpose of navigation; but it is contended that the defendants were not using the river for any such purpose, and that the place where the boat was anchored was not susceptible of any such uses or purposes. Under the rule laid down in Grand Rapids v. Powers, 89 Mich. 94, 14 L. R. A. 498, the plaintiff here would have the undoubted right to construct wharves or piers out over this low land to deep water. It is contended, however, by counsel for defendants, that in its then condition the defendants had the right to pass over it in their boat, and for so doing they cannot be counted as trespassers; that, it being covered by the waters of the Detroit river, the public has the right of navigation, and any member of the public may go and come freely either for business or pleasure anywhere within the navigable waters; and that this place was within the navigable waters. On the other hand, it is contended by counsel for plaintiff that those waters at the point where the boat of defendants was anchored are not navigable within the meaning of the term "navigable waters," as the courts now construe that term; and that, even if they could be construed as such waters, the defendants were not using them for that purpose. It is not contended that the defendants had injured the grass growing there, but that the trespass consisted in anchoring the boat, and shooting the ducks while so anchored.

Can these waters be considered as navigable? In Grand Rapids v. Powers, 89 Mich. 94, 14 L. R. A. 808, it was said: "Whatever may be the power of the legislature in waters, 'strictly navigable' to fix an arbitrary line beyond which riparian owners cannot go, or to delegate to a municipality that power, I am satisfied that no such right exists in the waters of Grand river at the rapids, or certainly in that part of the waters which are not now navigable for any purpose. The rights of the riparian owner, under our laws, are subject only to the public use for the purposes of navigation; and there is a manifest difference between public streams that can be used successfully for the running of boats and vessels for the purpose of commerce, and those which are only capable of being used for the floatage of lumber and logs in rafts or single pieces. The riparian owners are entitled to the beneficial and sole use of the latter streams, except for floatage; and when such streams have become unfitted for valuable public use, and have actually ceased to be used for public highways, there is no more reason for holding them to be public than in the case of a land highway which has been abandoned and is useless."—citing: Middleton v. Flat River Boom Co. 27 Mich. 583; Grand Rapids Boom Co. v. Jarvis, 80 Mich. 308. See also Lorman v. Benson, 8 Mich. 18, 77 Am. Dec. 435; East Harbor Sportsman's Club v. Kelling (Ohio) 4 Det. L. N. No. 18. It must be conceded that this part of the Detroit river where the defendants were is not navigable. Whatever rights they may have had to anchor their boat in the deep water of the river and there hunt wild fowl, we are of the opinion that they had no right to go upon the waters which were not navigable and there anchor and hunt wild fowl. It was the property of the plaintiff, and he had the same right to control it as though it were upland. As was said in Sterling v. Jackson, 69 Mich. 488: "Since every person has the right of exclusive dominion as to the lawful use of the soil owned by him, no man can hunt or sport upon another's land but by consent of the owner. It will be conceded that the owner of lands in this state has the exclusive right of hunting and sporting upon his own soil." And again it was there said: "The defendant claims that he had the right to shoot the wild fowl from his boat, because, as the waters were navigable where he was, he had the right to be there; that there being no property in wild fowl until captured, if he committed no trespass in being where he was, no action will lie against him for being there and shooting the wild duck. There is a plausibility in the position, which, considered in the abstract, is quite forcible, and, if applied to waters where there is no private ownership of the soil thereunder, would be unanswerable. But, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, defendant had no right to be where he was, except for the purpose of pursuing the implied license held out to the public of navigating the waters over his land. So long as that license continued, he could navigate the water with his vessel, and do all things incidental to such navigation. He could seek the shelter of the bay in a storm, and cast his anchor therein; but he had no right to construct a 'hide,' nor to anchor his decoys for the purpose of attracting ducks within reach of his shotgun. Such acts are not incident to navigation, and in doing them defendant was not exercising the implied license to navigate the waters of the bay, but they were an abuse of such license." In that case the waters were actually navigable, and yet it was held a trespass to erect a "hide" and shoot ducks for the reason that the ownership of the soil was in the plaintiff, and the defendant by that act was not using the waters for the purpose of navigation. In the present case, the waters where the defendants were, were confessedly not navigable for any useful purpose. It is true they went there in a boat. They could have done this possibly by poling their boat up a narrow rivulet into the land to the center of the island, if such rivulet had existed, and with as much force contend that being there in a boat, they could hunt wild fowl. Most certainly the learned circuit judge was in error, if we are to adhere to the doctrine enunciated in Sterling v. Jackson, 89 Mich. 488. In that case the court compared the right of the public to navigate public waters to its right to pass over a highway on land. It was said: "It does not follow that, because a person is where he has a right to be, he cannot be held liable in trespass. A person has the right to drive his cattle along the public highway, but he has no right to depasture the grass with his cattle in the highway adjoining the land of another person. Also a person has a right to travel along a public highway, but this gives him no right to dig a pit, or remove the soil, or incumber it in front of lands belonging to others. . . . The defendant had the right of using the waters of the bay for the purpose of a public highway in the navigation of his boat over it, but he had no right to interfere with the plaintiff's use thereof for hunting, which belonged to him as the owner of the soil. The public had a right to use it as a public highway, but every other beneficial use and enjoyment belonged to the owner of the soil."

The court under the facts shown upon this record should have directed the verdict in favor of the plaintiff for nominal damages.

Judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

before a general election should be filled at that election under Rev. Stat. § 1964, read in connection with § 4766, as amended by Laws 1893, p. 155.

2. The use of the masculine pronoun in Const. art. 8, § 12, and in the statutes relating to the qualifications of a county clerk (§ 1965), does not restrict the right to hold such office to males, since other provisions of the Constitution expressly provide that certain officers must be

I. Distinction between the right to hold elective office and right to hold appointive office.

The court of appeals of Kentucky reasoned upon the theory that the Constitution of the state, by using words importing the masculine gender, thereby intended that only male citizens were eligible to the elective office. The court, however, admitted that woman was within the constitutional requirements of a citizen, but, following the doctrine that the Constitution, having denied woman the right to vote, had also denied her the greater right, that of holding the office voted for, it held in the case of Atchison v. Lucas (1885) 88 Ky. 451, that a woman could not hold the office of jailer. [As to women having been jailers in England, see post, IV. a]. This doctrine is not, however, always followed. See infra.

In Warwick v. State (1874) 25 Ohio St. 21, the supreme court of Ohio calls attention to the fact that § 4 of art. 15 of the state Constitution states that "no person shall be elected or appointed to any office in this state unless he possess the qualifications of an elector." The court then says that the word "office" in such Constitution does not apply to officers in private corporations or churches, or to the minor or subordinate officers in colleges, academies, and schools, such as professors and teachers and the like. Nor does it apply to all subordinate officers in the military or legislative department, to males, while an express provision that the clerk should be a male citizen, which previously existed in the statute, has been dropped.

3. A woman is eligible to election as a county clerk under Const. art. 8, § 12, providing that no person shall be chosen to an office "who is not a citizen of the United States, and who shall not have resided in this state one year."

(February 20, 1897.)

INFORMATION in the nature of quo warranto to determine by what right defendant claimed to hold the office of county clerk of St. Clair County. Judgment of ouster.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Graves & Clark and Francisco Brothers, with Mr. Edward C. Crow, Attorney General, for plaintiff:

Upon the admitted facts the defendant Hostetter became and was a usurper immediately after the general election, November 3, 1896.

The provisions of the law creating the office, as to filling vacancies therein, governs as against the general statute upon the same subject.

State, Easterling, v. Rankin, 33 Neb. 286.

Where the time of tenure is fixed, and no provision for holding over is found, then the tenure ceases on the day fixed in the statute creating the tenure, and the right to hold ceases upon that day.

the private secretary of the governor or numerous other such officers, and that the constitutional inhibition should therefore receive a restricted rather than an enlarged interpretation. Upon the question at issue, the court then decided that the word "office" applied alone to the probate judge and not his deputy, and therefore that it was competent for a probate judge to appoint a woman as deputy clerk.

In the case of Jeffries v. Harrington (1887) 11 Colo. 191, the supreme court of Colorado applied the Ohio doctrine to the construction of § 6 of art. 7 of the Constitution of Colorado, which also provides that "no person except a qualified elector shall be elected or appointed to any civil or military office in this state," and holds that the word "office" as therein used did not include the deputy clerkship.

The supreme court of Michigan likewise, in the case of Wilson v. Newton, 87 Mich. 493, held that as the office of county clerk was only ministerial, the officer might appoint a woman or any person whom he saw fit as deputy, for whose acts he and his sureties would be responsible. As to right of woman to hold the office of clerk of the county court, see infra, IV. b. 8.

Further, as to the doctrine that a woman is qualified to hold a ministerial office generally when not qualified to hold an office requiring greater qualifications, see infra, IV.

II. Right to hold judicial office.

a. Office of judge.

Kyd on Awards, p. 41, says that according to the idea of Justinian, a woman could not intermeddle with the office of a judge for the reason that it was contrary to the proper character of her sex, and cites a. Cod. l. 2, t. 56, § 6.

However, in Campbell's "Lives of the Lord Chancellors of England, vol. I. pp. 134-141, regarding the life of Queen Eleanor, Lady Keeper of the Great Seal, in the absence of King Henry, in the year 1233, we are told, among other things, that the Queen was to act with the advice of Richard, Earl of Cornwall the King's brother and others of the council, and that she held the office nearly a whole year performing the duties, as well judicial as ministerial." And Campbell further says: "I am thus bound to include her in the list of the chancellors and keepers of the Great Seal, whose lives I have undertaken to delineate."

The sittings referred to however, were interrupted by the accouchement of the judge when she was delivered of a daughter.

We are informed by Coke upon Littleton, 326a, [Note 290], that Anne, Countess of Pembroke, Dorset, and Montgomery, who had the office of hereditary sheriff, exercised it in person and that at the assizes at Appleby she sat with the judges on the bench; but it is considered by 4 Craik's Romance of the Peerage, 162, to be very improbable that she habitually discharged the duties of the office. L. R. A.

office in person as she could not have done so without violating the well-settled law.

It was afterwards enacted "that no sheriff, constable, or other bailiff of the King shall hold pleas of the Crown." 8 Bacon, Abr. 688.

The office of sheriff was partly judicial and partly ministerial, and the ministerial duties, such as that of a sheriff's attendance upon the judges, might be performed by a deputy,—as to which see, further, infra, IV. a.

Coke upon Littleton, 326a, note, states that while woman could not occupy the throne of France, such inability did not prevent her from succeeding to other dignity, and that it is shown "that Mahaut, Countess of Artois, assisted, not only at the trial of Robert of Flanders, but at the ceremony of the coronation of Philip the Long."

b. Office of justice of the peace.

In Massachusetts the justices of the supreme judicial court were of the opinion that a woman, either married or single, could not be appointed to exercise the judicial office of justice of the peace, and that the whole frame and purport of the Constitution of the state, and the universal understanding and unbroken practical construction for the greater part of a century afterwards all support this conclusion. Opinions of the Justices, 107 Mass. 604.

In Maine, at a later date (1874), upon a question proposed by the executive council, the opinion of the justices of the judicial court was to the effect that by the Constitution the whole political power of the state is vested in its male citizens. "Whenever in any of its provisions, reference is made to sex, it is to duties to be done and performed by male members of the community. Nothing in the language of the Constitution or in the debates of the convention, by which it was formed, indicates any purpose whatever of any surrender of political power by those who had previously enjoyed it or a transfer of the same to those who had never possessed it," and that, "having regard, then, to the rules of the common law as to the rights of women married and unmarried, as then existing; to the history of the past; to the universal and unbroken practical construction given to the Constitution of this state, and to that of the commonwealth of Massachusetts upon which that of this state was modeled,—we are led to the inevitable conclusion that it was never in the contemplation or intention of those forming our Constitution that the offices thereby created should be filled by those who could take no part in its original formation, and to whom no political power was intrusted for the organization of the government then about to be established under its provisions, or for its continued existence and preservation when established." And the opinion was thereupon rendered that a woman could not be legally appointed and qualified as a justice of the peace. The opinion went

If Mrs. Wheeler is ineligible or has not been legally elected, that is a question to be determined in a direct proceeding against her, if she enters and takes possession of the office.

While as to some officers the Constitution says, the person to be eligible must "be a male citizen of the United States" (Mo. Const. art. 5, § 19) yet there is nothing concerning clerk of county court, except the general inhibition, which does not bar a woman.

Mo. Const. art. 8, § 12; art. 6, § 89; art. 14.

Nor was or is she barred from an office of this kind by the common law.

further, however, to the effect that "while the offices created by the Constitution are to be filled exclusively by the male members of the state, we have no doubt that the legislature may create new ministerial offices, not enumerated therein, and, if they deem expedient, may authorize the performance of the duties of the offices so created by persons of either sex." And it was declared that the legislature might authorize the appointment of married or unmarried women to administer oaths, take acknowledgment of deeds, or solemnize marriage. Opinions of the Justices, 63 Me. 596. [Three out of eight justices dissenting.]

a. Office of arbitrator.

In the case of Evans v. Ives, 15 Phila. 635, upon the question whether or not woman could sit as an arbitrator, and after considering the many cases in which celebrated women had held government offices in the history of the world, the court said: "Without referring in any manner to Eve, the first arbitrator appointed in this world to decide the controversy about eating the forbidden fruit, or to the manner Deborah judged Israel, we are clearly of the opinion that under the act of 1836, a woman, married or single, may be appointed arbitrator, and may act as such, and make a valid award.

In Duchess of Suffolk's Case, 8 Edw. IV. 1, it appears that the Duchess of Suffolk was arbitrator, but no question seems to have been raised as to her eligibility as to administrative offices connected with courts. See infra, IV. b, 7, 8, 9, 10.

The office of master in chancery in Illinois seems to have so close a similarity to administrative offices, although some judicial functions belong to it, that it is classed with that of notary public among administrative offices. See infra, IV. b, 9.

III. Right to hold legislative office.

In the case of Chorlton v. Lings, L. R. 4 C. P. 374, 38 L. J. C. P. N. S. 1, Justice Willes took occasion to say that while Kemble in his "Saxons in England" shows that the Queen and other women, who as he believes were ecclesiastics of rank and wealth, did sign charters, yet he deems that not sufficient evidence from which to draw the conclusion that women could regularly take part in the public councils of the Anglo-Saxons.

The case of De Souza v. Cobden [1891] 1 Q. B. 687, is one in which a single woman had been elected a member of the London County Council. The proceeding against her was for a penalty for having acted without being qualified, and it was not necessary for the court to decide the question of her eligibility, but Lord Esher called attention to the fact that "by the common law of England women are not in general deemed capable of exercising public functions, though there are certain exceptional cases where a well-recognized custom to the contrary has become established, as in the case of overseers of the poor [see infra, IV. b, 7]; and, of course, if women are especially mentioned in an act of Parliament, they will be qualified;" and he was of the opinion that the statute being silent in that regard, it did not intend that woman should be elected to act as a member of the London county council.

But the same question was expressly decided in Heresford-Hope v. Lady Sandhurst, L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 79, 58 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 316, 61 L. T. N. S. 150, 37 Week. Rep. 543. Although the statute expressly provided that for purposes connected with the right to vote under the municipal corporations act words of masculine gender should include women, and another statutory provision is that any persons who have the power to vote may be chosen councillors.

In this case Lord Esher, M. R., refers to the somewhat extensive opinion, as to the status of women and the offices they had filled, by Willes, J., in Chorlton v. Lings, L. R. 4 C. P. 374, 38 L. J. C. P. N. S. 1, which was a case relating to women's right to vote, and says: "What I deduce from his judgment is, that for such somewhat obscure offices as those, exercised often in a remote part of the country, where nobody else could have been found who could exercise them, women had been admitted into them by way of exception."

The specific requirement of qualifications for holding a legislative office may be such as to disqualify females, as, for example, to be a member of the legislature in Kansas one must be, at the time of election, a qualified voter and resident of the county or district for which he is chosen. Woman not being a qualified voter in Kansas, she is disqualified from becoming a member of the state legislature as shown by the dictum in Wright v. Noell, 16 Kan. 601.

IV. Right to hold administrative office.

a. When functions exercisable by deputy; generally.

It was at an early date held in England that a woman might hold a hereditary office although it were of an executive or an administrative character, if it were possible for her to exercise the functions thereof by deputy, and in some cases it was held that because such an office could descend to her by inheritance, it could be given to her by express grant.

We learn that as early as 1673 a woman, in the person of Lady Broughton, held the office of keeper of the Gate house prison. Rex v. Lady Broughton, 3 Keb. 32, also Westminster v. Broughton, 3 Keb. 151.

On the authority of the Lady Broughton Case, it was held in Anonymous, 3 Salk. 2, that the keeper of the workhouse at Chelmsford, being a woman, was not disqualified on account of her sex. The court said: "She may be capable of executing the Wilson v. Newton, 87 Mich. 493; Von Dorn v. Mengedoh, 41 Neb. 525; Foltz v. Hoge, 54 Cal. 23; Findlay v. Thorn, 1 How. Pr. N. S. 76; Nathaniel C. Moak in 41 Alb. L. J. p. 244.

At common law infants and women were placed upon the same footing in many respects as to eligibility to office. Our courts, both Federal and state, have recognized both infants and women, where there are no express inhibitions in the Constitution or laws.

United States v. Bizby, 10 Bias. 520; Moore v. Graves, 3 N. H. 408; Golding's Petition, 57 N. H. 146, 21 Am. Rep. 66.

"The office of county clerk is wholly ministerial," and hence falls in that class of cases which women and even infants could hold at the common law.

Wilson v. Newton, 87 Mich. 493; Warwick v. State, 25 Ohio St. 21; Jeffries v. Harrington, 11 Colo. 191.

Statutes are construed in the light of previous statutes upon the same subject. Taking the previous statutes upon the qualifications of clerks of courts of record there is no doubt of the legislative intent to remove the inhibition contained in the statutes of 1855 and 1865.

Gray v. Cumberland County Comrs. 83 Me. 429; Snyder v. Compton, 87 Tex. 374; Gunter v. State, 83 Ala. 96; United States v. Lacher, 184 U. S. 624, 38 L. ed. 1080.

The word "person" as used in the Constitution and statute includes women as well as men. Von Dorn v. Mengedoh, 41 Neb. 525; Opinion of the Justices, 136 Mass. 578.

office either by herself or deputy, as the Lady Braughton did."

For the reason that Lady Braughton had been keeper of the Gate house prison, as shown by 8 Keb. 32, it was held in Hilary, Term, 2 Anne, Reported Anonymous, 2 Ld. Raym. 1014, that the appointment of a woman as governor of a workhouse was good, and she could act by deputy.

A woman was permitted to hold the office of custodian of a castle, we are informed by Lady Russell's Case, Cro. Jac. 17, 5 Comyns' Dig. 189. It is said for the reason that she could exercise its functions by deputy.

Likewise a woman was permitted to hold the office of forester, as shown by 4 Coke Inst. 311, 5 Comyns' Dig. 189, the courts saying that she could attend by deputy who should be sworn.

By the Duke of Buckingham's Case, 3 Dyer, 285b, we see that the hereditary office of constable of England descended to his two daughters, which office, it was held, they might exercise by deputy, and that after the marriage of the elder her husband should alone exercise its function if the King did not refuse such services.

It was said in Callis on Sewers, p. 253, that "it was adjudged in B. R. 5 Car. I. that the office of marshal of that court will descend to a feme, and that she might execute it by her deputy. Citing Herne's Reading, 4 [ed. 1685]."

So, in case of the Lord Great Chamberlain of England, 2 Bro. P. C. (2d ed.) 146, it is said that the office of Great Chamberlain of England is hereditary, and that on the death of the incumbent, seized in fee thereof, who left two sisters, the office belonged to both and they could exercise it by deputy subject to the King's approval of the deputy.

It was also deemed competent for a woman to hold the office of marshal of England by grant for the reason that such office could descend to her by inheritance. 5 Comyns' Dig. 189.

But in Kentucky, as stated supra, L., it is held that a woman cannot be a jailor.

b. When functions exercisable in person.

1. Sheriff.

It is stated in Coke on Littleton, 326a, note, that in England, "the celebrated Anne, Countess of Pembroke, Dorset, and Montgomery, held the office of hereditary sheriff of Westmoreland, and exercised in person," but as indicated supra, [I. a.], she may have exercised the ministerial functions of her office by deputy.

For eligibility of woman to be a jailor, see supra, L. and IV. a.

2. Overseer of the poor.

In King v. Stubbs, 2 T. R. 386, it was held that a woman was eligible to the office of overseer of the poor. This was under Stat. 43 Elizabeth which required that overseers of the poor should be substantial "house holders." It was held that there was nothing in the nature of the office to make a woman incompetent.

3. Sexton of the parish.

Case of Olive v. Ingram, 2 Strange, 1114, 7 Mod. 263, 273, 274, is doubly interesting for the reason that it not only held that woman is capable of holding the office and exercising the functions of sexton of the parish, but that woman being the owner of property was a qualified voter for the purpose of electing such officer.

4. Commissioner of sewers, fish commissioner, forester, etc.

In seeking to determine whether the Countess of Warwick was a "compatible commissioner" within Statute 23 Henry VIII., chap. V., Robert Callis, Esq., in the fourth lecture on such statute delivered by himself at Gray's Inn, London, in August, 1622, said that "although it is uncouth in our law to have woman justices and commissioners, and to sit in places of judicature, yet by the authorities ensuing, you shall find this a point worth insisting upon, both in human and in divine learning; for in Genesis, chapter the first, after the creation of all other creatures being finished, the heaven adorned and the earth replenished, God said: 'Let us make man in our own image, after our likeness; and let him have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over all the earth, and every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. So God created man in His own image, in the image of God created He him, male and female created He them; and said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it; and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of heaven, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth.' This was the first commission that ever was granted; and it passed under the Divine immediate seal of the Almighty, and extended over the whole world. And by the virtue of the word 'dominamini,' in the plural number, God coupled the woman in commission with the man."

The learned lecturer further shows that while woman was created a commissioner over fishes, and over birds and beasts, that such commission extended over neither man nor woman; but after citing divers cases of Divine authority to sustain that doctrine, he called attention to many instances in ancient and modern history, some of which have been already stated herein, and on the strength of such authority he stated that his opinion was that a woman might be commissioner of sewers in London. Countess of Warwick's Case, Callis on Sewers, 250, 252; Cited also in 13 Vin. Abr. 159.

5. Director of the work-house, matron, medical superintendent of the hospital, member of the board of health, etc.

In the case of State, Atty. Gen., v. Wilson, 29 Ohio

A woman is a citizen of the United States and of the state the same as a man.

Webster, Citizenship, 75; U. S. Const. 14th Amend.; Pomeroy, Municipal Law, pt. 2, chap. 2, p. 425; 1 Abbott, Law Dict. ed. of 1879, 224; United States v. Kellar, 11 Biss. 814; Ware v. Wisner, 50 Fed. Rep. 810; Comitis v. Parker, 56 Fed. Rep. 558, 23 L. R. A. 148; Hatch v. Ferguson, 57 Fed. Rep. 959; Belcher v. Parren, 69 Cal. 73; United States v. Anthony, 11 Blatchf. 200; Minor v. Happersett, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 162, 22 L. ed. 627; Spencer v. Board of Registration, 1 MacArth. 169, 29 Am. Rep. 532; Wright v. Noell, 16 Kan. 601; State, McCampbell, v. Howard County Ct. 90 Mo. 593.

The pronouns "he" and "his" include women as well as men, so that there is no statutory inhibition by the use thereof.

State v. Jones, 102 Mo. 305; Re Thomas, 16 Colo. 441, 18 L. R. A. 538; Richardson's Case, 8 Pa. Dist. R. 299, 41 Alb. L. J. 244.

The word "citizen" as used in the Constitution and statute must be taken in its ordinary sense and meaning.

Martin v. Hunter, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 304-326, 4 L. ed. 97-102; Clark v. Utica, 18 Barb. 453; Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 6570; Henry & C. Co. v. Evans, 97 Mo. 47, 8 L. R. A. 332; Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 6568; Warren v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. 115 Mo. 572.

The court cannot go behind the election returns,—that is, the returns as cast up and announced by the canvassing board, composed

St. 347, it was held that a woman was not eligible to the office of medical superintendent of a hospital for the insane, for the reason that such place is an "office" within the Constitution of the state of Ohio requiring that a person holding an "office" shall be a duly qualified elector.

And in State, Rupp, v. Rust, 4 Ohio, C. C. 329, for the same reason it was held that females could not be members of the board of work-house directors, but in rendering such a decision, the courts said further that there were many positions in such institutions that might be held by woman, such as matron, clerk, caretaker, advisers, and other like positions; and concluded by saying that the law might be so amended as to provide therefore; or that the board having the legal control, might delegate to woman many of the duties and functions which the law attempted to confer upon the members of the board of directors.

In Massachusetts, however, the justices of the supreme judicial court were of the opinion that the Statute of 1879, chap. 291, § 2, providing that the governor, with the advice and consent of the council, might appoint nine persons to constitute the state board of health, lunacy, and charity, included woman within the meaning of the word "persons," and therefore that woman might be so appointed a member of the state Board of Health. Opinions of the Justices, 136 Mass. 578.

6. Superintendent of public instruction, school director, inspector, etc.

In Peabody v. Boston School Committee, 115 Mass. 383, where the board refused to receive a woman as member on the ground of her sex, the court refused to interfere on the ground that it had no power to do so, but the legislature then passed an act prohibiting their exclusion.

A case which has had general force as authority on subject of the right of woman to hold offices generally, as well as authority in the particular line of its decision, is that of the Opinion of the Justices, 115 Mass. 602. The justices were of the opinion that if the Constitution of the state prevented a woman from being a member of the school committee it must be by force of some express provision thereof, or else by a necessary implication arising from the nature of the office itself, or from the law of Massachusetts as existing when the Constitution was adopted and in the light of which it must be read. Reasoning from this premise, they were of the opinion that inasmuch as the Constitution contains nothing relating to school committees, the office is created and regulated by statute; and the Constitution confers upon the general court full power and authority to name and settle annually, or provide by fixed laws for naming and settling all civil officers within the commonwealth, the election and constitution of whom are not in the Constitution otherwise provided for; and as the 88 L. R. A.

common law of England, which was our law upon the subject, permitted a woman to fill any local office of an administrative character (see supra, IV.), the duties attached to it were such that a woman might be a member of a school committee for the reason that the duties thereof, which consisted of general charge and superintendence of schools, including the employment of teachers and selection of text-books, the regulation of the attendance of pupils, and the preparing of school registers and returns, were of such a nature that they could be well and efficiently performed by woman.

Following the Massachusetts doctrine, the supreme court of Kansas, in the case of Wright v. Noell, 16 Kan. 601, reasoned philosophically upon the theory that "all political power is inherent in the people," and all power not delegated by the Constitution remains with them," and considers that while the Constitution has restricted those who may vote to males, that it has not restricted those who may hold office to males except as to members of the legislature, each of whom must be at the time of his election a qualified voter, and resident in the county or district for which he is chosen, and inasmuch as there was no express disqualification of females, and no affirmative statement of required qualification which did exclude them, and as there was nothing in the language of the section creating the office, nor in the duties imposed by law upon the officer, which would imply the necessary or intended exclusion of either sex, that woman is eligible in Kansas to the office of county superintendent of schools.

The supreme court of Iowa, in Huff v. Cook, 44 Iowa, 638, likewise followed the Massachusetts doctrine, and held that though the Constitution of Iowa resembled the Constitution of the state of Massachusetts in this respect, and that as such Constitution had been construed as above indicated, (see Opinion of Justices, 115 Mass. 602, supra), there being no provision of the Constitution prohibiting a woman from holding the office of county superintendent of schools, that a woman's right to hold and exercise the duties of such an office was within the control of the legislature, and therefore that a legislative provision "that no person shall be deemed ineligible, by reason of sex, to any school office in the state of Iowa," or that "no person who may have been or shall be elected or appointed to the office of county superintendent of common schools or school director in the state of Iowa shall be deprived of office by reason of sex," was constitutional and of full force and effect.

In Minnesota a woman is eligible to the office of county superintendent of schools for the reason that § 7, art. 7, of the Constitution of the state provides that "every person who, by the provisions of this article, shall be entitled to vote at any election, shall be eligible to any office which now is, or hereafter shall be, elective by the people in the district. . . . except as otherwise provided in this Constitution or the Constitution and laws of the United States;" and for the reason that in 1875, by an amendment of the Constitution of the state it was provided that "the legislature may, notwithstanding anything in this article, provide by law that any woman, at the age of twenty-one years and upward, may vote at any election held for the purpose of choosing any officers of schools, or upon any measure relating to schools, and may also provide that any such woman shall be eligible to hold any office pertaining solely to the management of schools;" and for the further reason that the court deemed the duties of county superintendent of schools, as prescribed by Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 36, §§ 5-74, inclusive, to pertain solely to the "management of schools." The constitutional permission and the legislative enactment so construed make woman eligible to such office. State, Hahn, v. Gordon, 33 Minn. 345.

of defendant, as county clerk, and two judges of the county court. The legality of votes of voters cannot be questioned.

In the case of State, Crosby, v. Cones, 15 Neb. 444, it was held that inasmuch as the statute expressly provided that woman might vote at school-district meetings, she was qualified to hold the office of school trustee, and the constitutional requirements for electors did not apply to school elections. In arriving at this decision, the court also followed the reasoning of the Opinion of the Justices, 115 Mass. 602.

The statute of Michigan (How. Stat. § 782) makes females eligible to the office of school inspector; but the supreme court in the case of Donough v. Dewey, 82 Mich. 309, declined to pass upon the constitutionality of the statute for the reason that such decision was not necessary to the determination of the case.

In Washington, a woman is eligible to the office of county superintendent of schools upon the authority of Gen. Stat. § 856, which says that whenever the word "he" or "his" occurs in this act, referring to either members of the board of education, county superintendents, city superintendents, teachers, or other school officers, it shall be understood to mean also "she" or "her." Russell v. Gup-till, 13 Wash. 360.

The Constitution of the state of Oregon requires that to be eligible to a "county office" in the state, one must be a qualified elector of the county, from which it necessarily follows, as decided in State, Carter, v. Stevens (1896) 29 Or. 464, that a woman is not eligible to the office of county superintendent of schools, and further that any act of the legislature attempting to make them so is unconstitutional in the face of such specific inhibition.

In Missouri, likewise, by force of § 8086 of the Revised Statutes requiring a school director to be a qualified voter of district, a woman is ineligible to the office of a school director. State, Ing, v. Mo-spaden (Mo.) 39 S. W. 81.

7. Pension agent, postmaster, etc.

In Re Hall (1882) 50 Conn. 131, 47 Am. Rep. 625, the question regarding the right of woman to practice law arose for decision. (On this subject see note to Re Leach (Ind.) 21 L. R. A. 701.) In arriving at a conclusion the court called attention to the fact that under the act of Congress of 1825, the Postmaster General was deemed to have power to appoint women as postmasters. The language of the act is: "The Postmaster General shall establish postoffices and appoint postmasters." Woman is not included except in the general term "postmasters," a term which seems to imply a male person, and woman was not referred to till the revision of 1874, which recognizes the fact that women had already been appointed, for it provides that the "bond of any married woman who may be appointed postmaster shall be binding on her and her sureties."

The court further called attention to the fact that the act of Congress on the subject of pension agents, authorized "the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint all pension agents, who shall hold their offices for the term of four years, and shall give bond," etc., and that at the last session of Congress (A. D. 1881-2) a married woman in Chicago was appointed for a third-term pension agent of the state of Illinois, and that the public papers stated that there was not a single vote against her confirmation in the Senate, and that public opinion everywhere approved of such appointment.

8. Clerk of the county court.

In STATE, CROW, v. HOSTETTER, a woman is held to be eligible in Missouri to the elective office of clerk of the county court for the reason that she is a "citizen" within the requirements of the law, and that the late amended Constitution in prescribing such requirements omits the words "free white male," citizen which occurred in the former Constitution thereby evincing an intention to admit females to the office, especially when such provision is construed together with other provisions of the Constitution expressly inhibiting any but male citizens to the office, and the word "his," as used in the Constitution in reference to officers, not being deemed to be restrictive for the reason of its long user in such manner to indicate both sexes.

In Michigan, likewise, in the case of Wilson v. Newton, 87 Mich. 493, the supreme court was of the opinion that only an elector could be chosen to the office of county clerk, but it was not necessary to decide the question.

As to appointment as deputy clerk, see supra, I.

Even if the name of the officer had not been upon the ballot, the constitutional and sovereign right of the voter to choose the officer is not lost, but the voter may write both the style of the office and the party he desires to vote for, and such party will be legally elected if receiving the greater number of votes.

Rep. 34, that the word "occupation," is a generic term embracing "office," "avocation," "engagement," "calling," "trade," etc., and that such word was, as used in the act, intended to include within its meaning a public office, and held that under the act a woman was eligible to the office of master in chancery.

Under Illinois statutes, a master in chancery can take depositions, administer oaths, compel attendance of witnesses, take acknowledgments of deeds and other instruments, and in the absence of the judge order the issuing of writs of habeas corpus, ne exeat, and injunction, and in general perform all the duties appertaining to the office by law of the state.

10. Grand juror.

The Code of Washington territory, providing that all electors and "householders" shall be competent grand jurors, it was held in the case of Rosenkrantz v. Territory, 2 Wash. Terr. 267, that a married woman could properly be a grand juror. Justice Turner, however, dissented and was of the opinion that a married woman was not the head of a family, and therefore not within the meaning of the term "householder."

This decision was followed in Schilling v. Territory, 2 Wash. Terr. 233; Hayes v. Territory, 2 Wash. Terr. 236; and Walker v. Territory, 2 Wash. Terr. 236.

But all these were expressly overruled by Harland v. Territory, 3 Wash. Terr. 131, in an opinion written by Judge Turner who had dissented in the Rosenkrantz case and whose views were now adopted by the majority of the court, to the effect that a married woman could not be a grand juror. But one ground of the decision was that the title of the act under which women claimed to be qualified 38 L. R. A.

to sit as grand jurors was so defective as to make the statute entirely void.

This case is followed in Rumsey v. Territory, 3 Wash. Terr. 332a, so far as it holds the act void for defective title, but the main question as to the right of married women to be considered householders is left undecided. The result of all these decisions is that the decision in the Rosenkrantz case is overruled but nothing is decided on the subject in that jurisdiction except the fact that the statute under which the question arose was void for defective title.

11. Notary public.

Because of the doctrine laid down in the Opinion of the Justices, 107 Mass. 604, cited supra, II, a woman cannot be appointed a notary public in Massachusetts for the reason that there is no clause in the Constitution of the state which, when read with reference to the history and nature of the office, and the long-continued and constant practice of the government and usage elsewhere, can be construed as authorizing the governor, by and with the consent of the council, to appoint a woman as a notary public. It is true there is nothing in the terms of the Constitution which prohibits woman from being appointed; but it is considered that, when read in view of what must have been the intention of the Constitution as warranted by previous custom, is that a woman cannot be so appointed. V. Conclusion.

It may be said to be the general doctrine now held both in England and America that women are ineligible to any important office except when made so by enactment. It is usually said that this is the common law of the subject. But it is somewhat startling to find that there is not a decision earlier than the present generation against their right. In the absence of any adjudication against them, the theory that they are incompetent at common law must be based on the fact that they did not actually hold office except in rare instances and that these instances were usually treated by the judges and law writers as exceptional. But there is quite an array of cases in which they did hold office and their right to do so was upheld.

Aside from the notable fact that in England, as in many other countries, women have often occupied the throne and have sometimes shown great capacity as rulers, it appears that at least one English Queen has performed judicial duties, and that at least one woman holding the office of sheriff performed judicial duties in the exercise of that office. Another woman is shown by the reports to 38 L. R. A.

Barclay, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an original action in this court to ascertain by what warrant defendant holds the office of clerk of the county court of St. Clair county. The proceeding was instituted by an information of the attorney general in his official capacity. The information contains a full recital of the facts. They have been admitted by the demurrer which defendant has filed. Counsel in this court, with commendable fairness, have waived formalities that might have caused delay, and have submitted have rendered an award as arbitrator at an early day, and as her competency does not seem to have been questioned there is nothing to show that this was deemed extraordinary. Other offices held by women are described in various cases as keeper of prison, keeper of workhouse, governor of workhouse, custodian of castle, overseer of the poor, sexton of the parish, forrester, commissioner of sewers, constable of England, marshal of England, great chamberlain of England, and marshal of the court of King's bench.

The simplest statement of the common-law situation is that while women did not generally hold office, and the question of their competency was not well settled, they did in fact hold various offices, some of which were of great importance; that some, but not all, of these were hereditary and the duties thereof were often performed by deputy; and that in every instance in which a woman's right to any office was questioned prior to the present generation she was held to be competent, although the court often took occasion to say that women were not competent to hold all offices.

In addition to the fact that some of the offices they held were hereditary, and that they sometimes exercised their functions by deputy, it is doubtless true that some of the offices were somewhat obscure, and were exercised, in the words of Lord Esher, "in a remote part of the country where nobody else could have been found who could exercise them." In view of all these facts the conclusion as to the common law of the subject is that women did not generally hold office, but that they did do so in quite a variety of instances, and that in every contest of a woman's right to any particular office her right was sustained. The authorities on the subject which are directly against women are all very recent, although the recent authorities are by no means unanimous against them, and there is a marked tendency in modern statutes to enlarge the rights of women in this respect.

the cause for prompt decision upon briefs that have been of great help towards the speedy determination of the controversy. In the view taken by this division of the court, the following are the decisive facts: Mr. Wheeler was elected clerk of the county court at the general election of 1894 for a term ending in January, 1899. He died October 24, 1896. Two days later the defendant, Mr. Hostetter, was commissioned by the governor to fill the vacancy. He qualified, and entered on the duties of the office, before the general election of November 3, 1896. He now holds the office by virtue of that appointment. At the general election mentioned Mrs. Maggie B. Wheeler and Mr. Hostetter received votes in St. Clair county for the office in question. On the 26th day of October, 1896, Mrs. Wheeler had been declared nominated for said office by the Republican party of said county. Her said nomination had been certified and acknowledged, and the certificate had been duly filed in the office of the clerk of the county court. Her name accordingly appeared (in advance of the election) upon the printed official ballot, as prepared for use at the election. The official ballot contained no other printed name as nominee for said office. The county tickets of the other political parties all showed blanks under the name of the office of clerk of the county court. At the close of the election it was found that Mrs. Wheeler had 1,938 votes for the office, while Mr. Hostetter had received 92. He so certified as county clerk. In due time Mrs. Wheeler received her commission from the governor, and thereupon duly qualified, having complied with all the required forms of law, notwithstanding which the defendant still holds possession of the office. The object of this proceeding is to test his right to do so, from and after January 4, 1897, the date on which Mrs. Wheeler took the last formal step towards qualifying to enter upon the duties of the office. There are two general grounds on which defendant seeks to justify the position he has assumed.

1. Defendant first contends that there was, in legal effect, no vacancy to be filled at the election of 1896. The substance of the argument on that point is that the existing ballot law makes no provision for a nomination to fill such a vacancy occurring within fifteen days of the general election; and hence that no election to fill the vacancy could properly be held in the circumstances of this case, but we consider § 1964, a complete answer to that contention, when read in connection with § 4766, as amended in 1893 (Laws 1893, p. 155):

"Sec. 1964, Vacancy, How Filled.—When any vacancy shall occur in the office of any clerk of a court of record by death, resignation, removal, refusal to act or otherwise, it shall be the duty of the governor to fill such vacancy by appointing some eligible person to said office, who shall discharge the duties thereof until the next general election, at which time a clerk shall be chosen for the remainder of the term, who shall hold his office until his successor is duly elected and qualified, unless sooner removed." A special provision governing the filling of a vacancy in a particular office should be obeyed, even as against a later law on the same general topic, unless the court finds ground to conclude that the later general law was intended to repeal or limit the more particular provision of the prior law. But the terms of § 4766, as amended in 1893, show no intent to repeal any part of § 1964, touching the conduct of an election to fill such a vacancy. The word "vacancy" as it is found in the last proviso of § 4766, no doubt means, as the learned counsel for defendant contend, a vacancy in some nomination. But where, by reason of death, as in this case, a vacancy in an office occurs shortly before a general election at which someone to fill the office for the unexpired term should be chosen, and no one has been nominated to said office, there is a vacancy in the nominations within the meaning of the election law. The omission to make a nomination for an office to be filled at the ensuing election constitutes a vacancy on the ticket, and it is the plain duty of the officers who prepare the official ballots to cause the name of any such office to be printed on the ballot, whether any nomination thereto has or has not been formally certified. Under § 4766 of the election law, such a "vacancy" certainly may be supplied at any time prior to the election, by a nomination authenticated in the mode pointed out by the ballot law. But even if we should concede that the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Wheeler happened too late to permit of placing a formal printed nomination on the ballot, under the present ballot law the people would nevertheless have the right to express their choice by writing on the ballot the name of any qualified person whom they desired to designate for any office which the law (§ 1964) permitted to be then filled by election. The electors are not restricted to the names or offices printed on the official ballot. People, Bradley v. Shaw (1892) 133 N. Y. 493, 16 L. R. A. 806; People, Goring v. Wappinger's Falls (1895) 144 N. Y. 617; Sanmer v. Patton (1895) 155 Ill. 553; Cole v. Tucker (1895) 164 Mass. 486, 29 L. R. A. 668. We hence conclude that the election of a county clerk was properly held at the general election in St. Clair county in November last.

2. The question, then, remains whether Mrs. Wheeler is ineligible. Some objections of a technical nature are raised by the plaintiff against any consideration of that question on this occasion. But we pass them by, because we find it unnecessary to decide them, since we have reached the conclusion that Mrs. Wheeler is eligible. The qualifications required of incumbents of certain offices in Missouri are prescribed by the Constitution. For instance, the governor, lieutenant governor, secretary of state, auditor, treasurer, attorney general, and superintendent of public schools must be "male" citizens, as must also be the members of the general assembly. Const. 1875, art. 4, §§ 4, 6; Id. art. 5, §§ 5, 15, 19. Every circuit judge must be a "qualified voter," which requirement is, in effect, the same as the word "male" imposes (as used in reference to the state officers above named). Const. art. 6, § 26; Id. art. 8, § 2. The following general command of the organic law applies to all offices (including, of course, that in view in this case): "No person shall be elected or appointed to any office in this state, civil or military, who is not a citizen of the United States, and who shall not have resided in this state one year next preceding his election or appointment." Article 8, § 12. There is no provision of the Constitution or of the statute law of Missouri expressly requiring the clerk of the county court to be a male. But it is argued that the intent to so declare appears from the use of the word "his" in the section of the Constitution just quoted, referring to all offices. If this view is sound, then the special caution observed in the Constitution by the section requiring the state officers above mentioned to be males was wholly useless, as the general section last cited would imply that requirement. A construction of the Constitution which renders meaningless any of its provisions should not be adopted. It is part of the general law of the state (and was before the time of the present Constitution) that where persons are referred to by words importing the masculine gender, females as well as males should be deemed included thereby, unless a contrary intent appears by the context or otherwise. Rev. Stat. 1855, p. 1024, § 10; Rev. Stat. 1889, §§ 6568, 6569. The mere use of the word "his" in the Constitution, in referring to the qualification of officers, we do not regard as evidencing a purpose to limit all office holding to the male sex, or as depriving the people of St. Clair county of the right to select a woman as clerk of their county court.

The section of the Constitution last above quoted was a new enactment in the organic law of 1875. In view of the care with which the electoral franchise was limited to males by the terms of the 2d section of the same article of the Constitution, the omission of similar language, in negatively defining certain qualifications of office holding, has a significance which tends towards the conclusion we have reached in this case. The Constitution we think, remits to the legislature the subject of proper qualifications to be possessed by the holders of such an office as is here in question. Article 6, § 39. Turning to the statute law, we find this provision in regard to the qualifications of clerks of the county court, viz.:

"Sec. 1965. Qualifications of a clerk.—No person shall be appointed or elected clerk of any court, unless he be a citizen of the United States, above the age of twenty-one years, and shall have resided within the state one whole year, and within the county for which he is elected three months before the election; and every clerk shall, after his election, reside in the county for which he is clerk."

The above section, and several other neighboring sections, concerning clerks, exhibit the words "he" and "his" in treating of these offices. But we do not regard that fact, as of moment when we recall the general rule for construction of laws, above alluded to (§ 6568). Women in Missouri have been licensed as attorneys at law by the supreme court. They have for years been recognized as eligible to office as notaries public. A woman now holds the responsible office of state librarian by appointment of the supreme court. Yet all of the laws under which such action has been taken display similar language to that in the law regarding clerks of courts from which the learned counsel for defendant seek to draw the inference that only males are eligible as such clerks. Rev. Stat. 1889, §§ 605, 607, 608, 7109, 7110, 8198, 8199, 8202. The particular qualifications pointed out by § 1965 (except those of citizenship and age) are far less vital and important than that of sex. If the law-makers had regarded sex as determining eligibility, it seems to us that they would have expressed themselves plainly to that effect, as they did in former years. They have so expressed themselves in other statutes; as, for instance, in the school law, which requires directors in certain cities to have the qualifications of voters. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 8086. We have held that, as males alone can be voters, under the Constitution of 1875, a woman is not eligible to be a school director under the section cited. State, Ing, v. McSpaden (1897; Mo.) 39 S. W. 81.

The fact that in the law governing clerks of courts no similar requirement appears is a clear pointer to the conclusion that no such qualification was intended to be demanded. Moreover, the change which the legislature has made in the language of the law on this very subject has much meaning in solving the question before this division. In 1855 the present § 1965 had the form shown in the copy below. It so remained until 1879, when it was amended by dropping the words we have noted by italics, viz.: "No person shall be appointed or elected clerk of any court, unless he be a free white male citizen of the United States, above the age of twenty-one years, and shall have resided within the state one whole year, and within the county for which he is elected three months, before the election; and every clerk shall, after his election, reside in the county for which he is clerk. Rev. Stat. 1855, p. 336, § 10. The dropping of the word "male" in describing the qualifications for such offices, has value as a guide to the legislative purpose in enacting the present law on this subject. Can there be any doubt as to the intended effect of such a change of the statute on the particular question before us? It is always allowable, in interpreting statutes, to consider the prior law as compared with the present in endeavoring to reach the true intent of the legislature, which, when found, is the spirit of the law that the courts should enforce. That women may be citizens of the United States and of Missouri is a proposition that requires no discussion at this day. Minor v. Happersett (1874) 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 162, 22 L. ed. 627; State, McCampbell, v. Howard County Ct. (1887) 90 Mo. 593. Mrs. Wheeler is a citizen of the United States, and of this state. She is over the age of twenty-one years. She has resided in Missouri one year next preceding her election, and she possesses all the other qualifications named in § 1965. It is conceded that she is in all respects qualified, barring the supposed objection on account of her sex. The office of clerk of a court is a ministerial office. It admits of the use of a deputy, and its duties are certainly not of such a nature as to be incompatible of discharge by a woman. In view of the condition of the positive law of Missouri above described, we do not consider it necessary to enter into a discussion of the eligibility of women to office at the common law or in other states of the Union. We regard the question at bar as one depending on the force and intent of the law of this state, organic and statutory. We hold that under that law there is no express or implied barrier to the election of a woman to such an office as that in question in this case, and that her fellow citizens may call her to discharge its duties if they see fit. Mrs. Wheeler is qualified to hold the office and Mr. Hostetter is not entitled to retain it on the facts disclosed.

Hence the demurrer will be overruled, and judgment of ouster will be entered against defendant unless he plead further within ten days.

STATE of Missouri, ex rel. KANSAS CITY, Resp't.,

v.
EAST FIFTH STREET RAILWAY
CAMPANY et al., App'ts.

(.....Mo.....)

1. The state may oust a street-railway company from its franchise to operate a railway in streets by quo warranto proceedings brought on relation of the city although the franchises were derived directly from the city under ordinances passed in the exercise of charter power conferred on the city by the state, which thus made the grant through the agency of the city.
2. A city is not estopped from enforcing the forfeiture of a street-railway franchise for nonuser merely because of its interference with the street-railway company's rights in some respects, unless that was such as to justify or excuse the nonoperation of the road.
3. A city cannot contract away or in any way abridge the sovereign power of the state to proceed against a street-railway company by quo warranto for forfeiture of its franchises, or even to do so on the relation of the city.
4. Entire failure to operate a street railway for three years when the ordinance under which the franchise was exercised required cars to run sixteen hours every day in the year constitutes a nonuser which forfeits the franchise.
5. An estoppel in pais cannot be relied upon unless pleaded.
6. A contract that nonuser of street-railway tracks for any specified time shall not operate as a forfeiture of the franchise cannot be made by a city, either by ordinance or otherwise, since this would involve an authority to grant the right of the use of streets for private purposes.

favor of relator in a quo warranto proceeding to oust defendants from the exercise of their corporate franchises. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Johnson & Lucas for appellants.

Messrs. H. C. McDougal and C. O. Tichenor, for respondent:

The essential properties of corporate existence are quite distinct from the franchises of the corporation. The franchise of being a corporation belongs to the corporators, while the powers and privileges, vested in and to be exercised by the corporate body, as such, are the franchises of the corporation. The latter has no power to dispose of the franchise of its members, which may survive in the mere fact of corporate existence, after the corporation has parted with all its property and all its franchises.

The franchises of a railroad corporation are rights or privileges which are essential to the operations of the corporation, and without which its road and works would be of little value; such as the franchise to run cars, to take tolls, to appropriate earth and gravel for the bed of its road, or water for its engines and the like. They are positive rights or privileges without the possession of which the road of the company could not be successfully worked.

Morgan v. Louisiana, 93 U. S. 223, 23 L. ed. 861.

A franchise is a right, privilege, or power of public concern, which ought not to be exercised by private individuals at their mere will and pleasure, but should be reserved for public control and administration, either by government directly, or by public agents, acting under such conditions and regulations as the government may impose in the public interest, and for the public security.

State, St. Louis Underground Service Co., v. Murphy, 134 Mo. 548, 34 L. R. A. 369.

Burgess, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding by the state at the relation of Kansas City, Missouri, by Marcy K. Brown, prosecuting attorney of Jackson county, Missouri, by quo warranto to oust defendants of their corporate franchises granted 38 L. R. A.

to them by said by ordinances to construct, maintain, and operate a street railway on certain streets in said city upon the ground of their failure to comply with said ordinance, and the consequent forfeiture of their franchise rights under said ordinance. The petition alleges: That the relator was, on the 9th day of May, 1889, and ever since has been, a municipal corporation under the laws of the state of Missouri, having full power and control over its streets. That defendants are corporations under the laws of this state, except defendant Thornton, who is trustee in a deed of trust executed by the East Fifth Street Railway Company on the 1st day of November, 1890, on the franchises hereinafter described. That by certain ordinances passed by said city the right was given, and accepted by said defendant railway company, to construct, maintain, and operate a street railway on certain of its streets. That by reason of said ordinances the defendant railway company claims the right to maintain and operate a street railway over certain streets named in said ordinance, and had in fact laid its tracks on said streets; but that said railway company had failed for eighteen months prior to November 12, 1892, to run cars over said streets, and had never complied with the provisions of said ordinances, although notice was given by relator to said company to run cars over said streets, but that it refused, and still refuses, so to do. That said railway company has failed and neglected for more than eighteen months prior to November 12, 1892, to keep in repair its tracks and roadbed, and permitted its tracks to become a nuisance, and has abandoned the rights granted in said ordinances. The answer admits the acceptance of the ordinances by the railway company, and alleges that said ordinances constitute valid and subsisting contracts between said city and defendant railway company. The answer also admits that defendant railway company and defendant trust company are now and were during the dates mentioned in said information, corporations organized under the laws of the state of Missouri, and that the deed of trust mentioned in the information has not been released or satisfied, and that defendants, by reason of said ordinances, claim the right to run, maintain, and operate a street railway over the streets named in said ordinances. It then alleges that § 17 of ordinance No. 42,389 requires an action for forfeiture to be brought within six months after cause of forfeiture has arisen, and that causes are alleged in the information to have arisen eighteen months prior to the filing of the information; that defendant railway company was unlawfully prevented by the police of the city of Kansas from constructing its railway on Fifth street from Grand avenue to Main street, and was harassed by litigation, whereby its credit was impaired, and its financial operations so embarrassed that it was unable to procure funds necessary to complete its railway, and was compelled to mortgage the same in its uncompleted condition to pay the loss sustained by reason of the acts of the city of Kansas, and to cease, temporarily, the operation of its cars, but intends to resume such operation at the earliest moment the financial condition of the public and itself will permit. It appears from the record that in December, 1881, by an ordinance of Kansas City, a franchise was granted to certain persons named in said ordinance, to construct and operate a street railway on certain streets in that city. The franchise was to continue for twenty years. The company was to keep the tracks in repair and the spaces between the tracks and for 18 inches on the outside well paved. Cars were to be regularly run for not less than sixteen hours per day "during each and every day of the entire year." With the consent of the grantees of the franchise, a subsequent order was passed, whereby the franchise was extended for thirty years from September 1, 1835, and the starting point fixed at Fifth street and Grand avenue, instead of Fifth and Main streets. In June, 1888, another ordinance was passed by said city, which recites in its preamble the following: "Whereas, the East Fifth Street Railway Company is the successor and owner of all franchises and ordinances above granted." This ordinance then, among other things, regulates the paving of spaces between the tracks, and the keeping of them in good condition and repair. Section 12 of this ordinance provides for the equipment of the road, and the running of the cars, and gave defendant the right to collect a fare of 5 cents for each passenger. By a still later ordinance, passed also in June, 1888, defendant was granted a franchise to extend its road to the eastern limits of the city. It had the right to operate its cars on this portion of its route by endless cable or noiseless steam power, with smokeless fuel. Section 17 of this ordinance reads as follows: "If the said railway company shall at any time fail, neglect, or refuse to obey and comply with any one of the provisions of this ordinance, then said company shall forfeit all rights, powers, and privileges by this ordinance granted and conferred, and this ordinance shall be null and void. Such forfeiture and such annulling of this ordinance may be had by proceedings instituted by the city of Kansas, in its own name, and against said company, in a court of record in Jackson county, Missouri, and on proof of such failure, neglect, or refusal on the part of said company; provided, that if any such proceedings be not commenced within six months after such failure, refusal, or neglect of said company to comply with any one of the provisions of this ordinance, then as to such failure, refusal, or neglect the city shall be deemed to waive the effect thereof under this section of this ordinance." From the date of the original ordinance—December, 1881—to the time of the trial in the court below, the road was only operated for two or three months, and then by electric cars. The company then suspended operating the road from eighteen months to two years, after which they ran some steam cars from one year and a half to two years. For about three years before the time of the trial of this cause, they ran no cars at all, and did nothing towards the operation of the road. Some time prior to the bringing of this proceeding, they sold their cars to some company in Texas, and paid the proceeds upon a mortgage upon the road, upon which was due about $110,000. The company is insolvent, but some of its officers testified that they expect to run it again. They seemed to have no idea when the company will operate the road again. The evidence on the part of defendant railway company showed that defendant was prevented by the Kansas City police force from laying its tracks on Fifth street between Grand Avenue and Main street; that the company was harassed by litigation by the city and property owners, which greatly depreciated the value of its property. It also tended to show that said company had not abandoned its rights under said ordinances. No notice was ever given by Kansas City to defendant railway company to run its cars. Nor was the information filed for more than six months after the alleged grounds for forfeiture arose. At the conclusion of the evidence, the court, at the request of the relator, gave the following declaration of law: "The court declares the law to be that, if defendant has ceased to operate its road, that it has sold its rolling stock and has none with which to operate its road, and that it has no means with which to purchase more stock, and is heavily in debt, then judgment must go for relator." The court gave judgment of ouster against the defendants. From said judgment defendants appeal.

1. Defendants' contention is that quo warranto is not the proper remedy in this case; that the state has no interest in this controversy; that the "franchise" granted by it, and the only one that it is interested in, is not the subject-matter of this litigation; that the questions involved are of a personal nature, between the relator on the one hand, and the defendant railway company on the other; the relator alleging failure to comply with the terms and conditions of a contract between it and defendant, and the defendant denying noncompliance and pleading estoppel,—a question that can be fully settled by a court of chancery in an action brought by the relator against the defendant. Upon the other hand, it is claimed that there is a difference between the charter and a franchise independent of it, and that this proceeding is based upon that distinction. In the case of Memphis & L. R. Co. v. Berry, 112 U. S. 619, 28 L. ed. 841, the court says: "The essential properties of corporate existence are quite distinct from the franchises of the corporation. The franchise of being a corporation belongs to the incorporators, while the powers and privileges, vested in and to be exercised by the corporate body as such, are the franchises of the corporation. The latter has no power to dispose of the franchise of its members, which may survive in the mere fact of corporate existence, after the corporation has parted with all its property and all its franchises." It may be said that corporate existence is as much a franchise as the franchises of the corporation. The former is not property in the ordinary acceptation of the term, cannot be transferred by ordinary conveyance or by sale under execution, unless the statutes of the state so provide; while corporate franchises are property, can be transferred by voluntary conveyance or by sale, under execution against the corporation. New Orleans, S. F. & L. R. Co. v. Delamare, 114 U. S. 501, 29 L. ed. 244. In the case in hand the privilege of laying its tracks on the designated streets, to run cars thereon, and to charge and receive fares from persons riding on its cars, were franchises of the defendant railway company, without which the charter would be of no value. Such privileges were not mere licenses. A different view, however, seems to have been taken in the case of People, Maybury, v. Mutual Gaslight Co. 38 Mich. 154, in which it was ruled that the right to lay pipes in the streets of a city is not a state franchise, but a local easement, resting only on a contract or license, the violation of which does not concern the state, and is open to legal remedy. A similar view seems also to have been taken by the supreme court of Illinois in the case of Beleville v. Citizens' Horse R. Co. 152 Ill. 171, 26 L. R. A. 681. But these cases we think not in line with the great weight of authority. Thus Mr. Justice Field in speaking of franchise in Morgan v. Louisiana, 93 U. S. 223, 23 L. ed. 861, says: "But the term must always be considered in connection with the corporation or property to which it is alleged to appertain. The franchises of a railroad corporation are rights or privileges which are essential to the operations of the corporation, and without which its road and works would be of little value; such as the franchise to run cars, to take tolls, to appropriate earth and gravel for the bed of its road, or water for its engines, and the like. They are positive rights or privileges, without the possession of which the road of the company could not be successfully worked. Immunity from taxation is not one of them. The former may be conveyed to a purchaser of the road as part of the property of the company; the latter is personal, and incapable of transfer without express statutory direction." A franchise is of public concern, which cannot be exercised by individuals at pleasure, but is of legislative origin, and from that source it must derive its power and authority to acquire rights and privileges for the public good. "It is an executed contract on the part of the state, the consideration for which is the benefit which the public will derive from its use and exercise." Ashland v. Wheeler, 88 Wis. 615; California v. California, P. R. Co. 127 U. S. 40, 32 L. ed. 157, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 153; New Orleans Waterworks Co. v. Rivers, 115 U. S. 674, 29 L. ed. 525; Wheat v. Alexandria, 88 Va. 742; Port of Mobile v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 84 Ala. 119; Baltimore Trust & G. Co. v. Baltimore, 64 Fed. Rep. 158. This court has recognized the rights of street railways in the streets of a municipality as franchises, and as vested rights which might be mortgaged to the company to whom the franchise belonged. Horelman v. Kansas City Horse R. Co. 79 Mo. 643. While the franchises involved in this controversy were derived directly from the city by the East Fifth Street Railway Company, under ordinances passed under the grant of power contained in the city charter, that power was conferred upon the city by the general assembly, so that the power came indirectly from the state; and in granting it the state acted through the city as its agent. Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 641, 25 L. ed. 338; Port of Mobile v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 84 Ala. 119. The power of the city to grant the franchises in question is unquestionable.

We do not think, however, that the fact that the franchises in question are, in a sense, contractual in their nature is a barrier to the prosecution of this suit if the facts alleged and proved be sufficient to oust defendant company of its franchises, notwithstanding § 17, supra, of the ordinance passed in June, 1888, provides that in case of failure, neglect, or refusal by the defendant railway company to obey and comply with any of the provisions of said ordinance said company shall forfeit all rights, powers, and privileges conferred thereby; and that such forfeiture may be had by proceedings instituted by said city in its own name against said company in a court of record in Jackson county, Missouri. The sovereign power of the state to proceed against defendant company by quo warranto for forfeiture of its franchises even at the relation of the city could not be contracted away, or in any way abridged, by the city. At most, such a provision in the ordinance only provided the city another remedy. Fath v. Tower Grove & L. R. Co. 105 Mo. 545, 18 L. R. A. 74; Washington & B. Turnp. Road v. State, 19 Md. 239. Moreover a proceeding in equity is not the proper remedy to enforce the forfeiture of a franchise. Pomeroy in his work on Equity Jurisprudence (2d ed. § 459), says: "It is a well-settled and familiar doctrine that a court of equity will not interfere on behalf of the party entitled thereto and enforce a forfeiture, but will leave him to his legal remedies, if any, even though the case might be one in which no equitable relief would be given to the defaulting party against the forfeiture." The same rule is announced in High on Extraordinary Remedies (2d ed. § 660), in which it is said: "The dissolution of a corporation and the revocation of its franchises are generally considered matters of legal rather than of equitable cognizance; and, unless a court of chancery is especially empowered to divest a corporation of its franchises, the more appropriate remedy for this purpose is by information in the nature of a quo warranto." Atty. Gen. v. Tudor Ice Co. 104 Mass. 239, 6 Am. Rep. 227; Union Nat. Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621, 25 L. ed. 188. In Horelman v. Kansas City Horse R. Co. 79 Mo. 643, this court said: "It is the settled rule that the acts of a corporation can be assailed for abuse or excess of its corporate powers only in a direct proceeding brought by the state for that purpose." The city granted the franchises in the interest of the public, and we see no reason why she should not be relator in this proceeding to have the franchises forfeited in the interest of the public also, if the facts and circumstances in proof justify such a result.

The question then arises, Was the nonuser of the franchises by defendant company under the circumstances disclosed by the record sufficient to justify the court in declaring their forfeiture? In considering this question it may be said that the insolvency of the corporation is of no importance except in so far as it may have a bearing upon the question of abandonment of its franchises by defendant, for, if defendant continued to discharge its duties to the public, it makes no difference whether it was solvent or not. Were it otherwise, very many corporations might be ousted of their franchises at any time, to the great detriment of the members thereof, as well also as the general public for whose benefit public corporations and franchises are presumed to be granted. The sale, however, by the defendant company of all of its rolling stock, and its failure to operate its road for so long a time, and then not in accordance with the terms of the ordinance, tended very strongly to show an abandonment by defendant of its franchises. But whether there was an abandonment by defendant of its franchises or not, the evidence clearly shows that the ordinances granting the railroad company the franchises were never complied with. Electric cars were run for about three months, and then steam cars, which it had no right to run, except upon the eastern extension of the road. It ran steam cars for about eighteen months, and for three years next preceding the trial it did not operate its road at all, while under the ordinances, its cars were to be regularly run not less than sixteen hours per day during every day in the year. In the case of Roanoke Investment Co. v. Kansas City & S. E. R. Co. 103 Mo. 50, it is said: "But while it is true that mere nonuser will not amount to an abandonment, it is well settled that an easement acquired by grant, or its equivalent, may be lost by abandonment. To constitute an abandonment of an easement acquired by grant, acts must be shown of such an unequivocal nature as to indicate a clear intention to abandon. Curran v. Louisville, 88 Ky. 628; Dyer v. Sanford, 9 Met. 895, 43 Am. Dec. 399; Hoyford v. Spokesfield, 100 Mass. 491. It is said, however, that abandonment will be more readily inferred when the easement was granted for public purposes than when it was created for private use." In 1 Beach on Private Corporations (§ 45), it is said: "It is conceded that a corporation may forfeit its charter or franchises for wilful misuser or nonuser thereof. For it is a tacit condition annexed to the creation of every corporation, that it shall be subject to dissolution by forfeiture of its franchise for wilful misuser or nonuser in regard to matters which go to the essence of the contract between it and the state." On the same subject Morawetz on Private Corporations says (§ 1018): "It has accordingly been held in various cases, that, if a corporation has assumed the performance of duties for the benefit of the public generally, it cannot neglect the performance of these duties without incurring a forfeiture of its franchises. Thus it is the duty of a corporation chartered to build a turnpike road to maintain its road in repair as a thoroughfare for the public use. . . . The same rule undoubtedly applies to other corporations of a similar character, such as ferry and bridge companies, canal companies, gas companies," etc. The generally accepted doctrine is that the omission of an express duty imposed by the charter of a corporation is cause for its forfeiture, and in such circumstances the sovereign who granted the charter may insist on resuming the grant for breach of the duty imposed. Com. v. Commercial Bank, 28 Pa. 889; Atty. Gen. v. Petersburg & R. R. Co. 6 Ired. L. 456; Erie & N. E. R. Co. v. Casey, 26 Pa. 287. And where there has been a wilful misuser or nonuser by a corporation, it is subject to dissolution by forfeiture of its franchises. Mumma v. Polomac Co. 83 U. S. 8 Pet. 281. 8 L. ed. 945; Terrett v. Taylor, 13 U. S. 9 Cranch, 51, 8 L. ed. 653; 88 L. R. A.

Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Needles, 113 U. S. 574, 28 L. ed. 1084; People v. Broadway R. Co. 126 N. Y. 29. "The rule in regard to acts of misuser and nonuser is that they must relate to matters of the essence of the contract between the sovereign and the corporation, and we see no reason why that rule should not be applied in the present case. Where duties are imposed upon a corporation from motives of public policy, a total neglect of the duty justifies a judgment of forfeiture." State, Atty. Gen., v. Wood, 18 Mo. App. 139; Harris v. Mississippi Valley & S. I. R. Co. 51 Miss. 602. One of the duties imposed upon defendant by ordinance, which it accepted, and in which the public had an interest, was to run its cars sixteen hours every day in the year, with which there was no compliance on its part, but a total neglect of its duty; hence nonuser. It was held in State, Whitecotton, v. Hannibal & R. O. Gravel Road Co. 87 Mo. App. 496, that quo warranto would lie where a corporation is charged with misuser or nonuser of its franchises.

2. But it is insisted by defendant that relator is estopped to maintain this action upon the grounds: First, that by its military force it prevented the company, and still prevents it, from completing its contract, and entering on the enjoyment of its grant; second, that the city, by its common council, passed an ordinance repealing, or attempting so to do, the grant made to defendant; third, that relator compelled the defendant to tear up its turntable, and by reason thereof necessitated and required the defendant to change its equipment, and to dispose of the equipment purchased by it, and then in use; fourth, that relator, by litigation instituted before defendant ceased to operate the road, rendered impossible the operation of the road on the part of defendant, and is, by reason thereof, estopped from taking advantage of its own wrong. With respect to the first proposition, W. J. Smith, president of defendant company, testified that, even if the city had allowed the company to lay a track from Main to Walnut streets, it would not have done the company any good until they got some right of way from the Metropolitan from Walnut to Grand avenue, which it never succeeded in doing. It seems that Fifth street between Walnut and Grand avenue, upon which there were at the time two parallel tracks owned by the Metropolitan Street-Railway Company, is only 30 feet between the curbs, and that there was no room for another track; hence, unless the defendant company could in some way have acquired the right to use the Metropolitan tracks, that part of the route from Main to Walnut, even had it been constructed, would have availed nothing; therefore no justification or excuse for not operating the road. Nor do we see how the fact that the city may have passed an ordinance repealing, or attempting to so do, the grant made to defendant could have afforded it any excuse for noncompliance with the ordinances. It is well settled that estoppel in pais must be pleaded, and, as the answer contains no allegation to the effect that the city compelled defendant to tear up its turntable, that question cannot be considered by this court. The records of the suits mentioned in the fourth proposition are not copied into the bill of exceptions, so that it is impossible to tell anything about the issues involved in them, or what possible effect they may have had upon defendant's failure to operate the road. The only litigation mentioned in the answer seems to have been by the city, and the evidence shows that it resulted in favor of defendant. But even the record in this suit is not in the bill of exceptions.

8. A further contention is that the record shows that the relator waived all the causes of forfeiture complained of. This contention is based upon § 17 of the ordinance supra, which in case of forfeiture by defendant of its franchises for failure to comply with the provisions of said section, provides that such forfeiture may be had by proceedings instituted by said city in its own name in a court of record in Jackson county, Missouri, and that if any proceedings be not commenced within six months after such forfeiture has accrued, the city shall be deemed to waive the effect of such forfeiture. The streets of Kansas City are for the use of the general public, and its officers had no right to contract with defendant by ordinance or otherwise that nonuser of its tracks by the corporation for the period of six months, or any other length of time, should not operate as a forfeiture of its franchises. To do so would be to recognize the authority of the city to grant the right of the use of its streets for private purposes, which it clearly has no right to do. To lay railroad tracks in the streets of the city, and then not use them, would not be a public use; and it is only in that sense that a city has a right to grant the use of its streets to any person or corporation for the purpose of operating cars thereon. To grant the use of its streets for a private use would be a misappropriation of the streets, and without authority on the part of the city. If the city had the right to provide by ordinance against the forfeiture of the franchises of defendant on account of the nonuser of its tracks for a period of six months, it had the same right to provide against its forfeiture for an indefinite period, and thereby convert the use which was and could only be public to a private use. State, St. Louis Underground Service Co., v. Murphy, 134 Mo. 548, 34 L. R. A. 369. In the case of Washington & B. Turnp. Road v. State, 19 Md. 239, it was said: "The consequence of the argument that an inability to keep the road in good order, owing to want of means, relieves the company from the duties imposed upon it by its charter, would be that the state would be obliged to permit the existence of roads impassable, and even dangerous. Such, it may safely be asserted, is without support from authority. In fact, the conclusion would seem to be inevitable, that if (as is conceded) the state can authorize the construction of a railroad anywhere within her jurisdiction, such authority is absolute, and can impose upon her no restriction, no loss of any other of her sovereign rights and powers, and cannot operate to close the doors of her own courts against her, when she wishes to inquire into the delinquencies of a corporation created by her, and responsible to her. [Citing cases.] . . . The rule is, that, as against the state, no waiver can be presumed, unless a clear intention to waive the forfeiture, with a full knowledge of the facts, can be gathered from the legislation relied on to prove such intention. . . . Moreover, to maintain that such an act is a waiver of any cause of forfeiture happening up to that time, and then to argue that the charter cannot be vacated, because the road is now (as the plea states) in as good order as it was then, is to make the condition of the road at that time, and not the charter, the standard of the obligations of the appellants for all time. Such, of course, cannot be the true measure of their liability. It is to the charter, and the charter alone, that we must look for the character and extent of their rights and duties. Nor would it by any means follow that, because the state did not choose, in 1893, to enforce a forfeiture, she designed to declare that so long as the road was maintained as it then was, the company should be unmolested. The fourth plea insists that the conduct of the state up to 1858 amounts to a waiver; that is, that the silence of the state, her failure to authorize proceedings against the company, is to be held equivalent to a declaration that no cause of forfeiture had occurred. This, obviously, does not come up to the terms of the rule we have stated above. . . . And to hold the silence of the state from 1839 up to 1858 to be a conclusive argument against her present right to revoke franchises when the conditions are forfeited on which those franchises were granted, would be to make the long-continued clemency and forbearance of the state, the means of destroying her rights and restricting her powers." Moreover, the city had no power or authority by ordinance or otherwise to take away from its sovereign right to proceed by its public officer, the prosecuting attorney of the county, against the defendant by quo warranto for ouster of its franchises upon the ground of their forfeiture.

The judgment is affirmed.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Minnesota, ex rel. William P. NISBETT, Jr., Rept.,

v.

Michael J. TOOLE, Sheriff, Appt.

(.....Minn.....)

- *1. The governor of a state has the power to revoke his warrant for the surrender of an alleged fugitive from justice at any time before he is taken out of the state.
2. In a proceeding in habeas corpus on behalf of the alleged fugitive, if it appears that the warrant has been revoked, he must be discharged, and the grounds of such revocation cannot be inquired into.

(June 23, 1897.)

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for St. Louis County discharging relator from the custody of defendant to which he had been committed under extradition proceedings. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Draper, Davis, & Hollister and C. C. McCarthy for appellant.
Mr. Frank F. Price, contra.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon the requisition of the governor of Illinois for the extradition of the relator as a fugitive from justice, the governor of Minnesota issued his warrant directed to all the peace officers of the state, and particularly to the sheriff of Itasca county, commanding them to arrest and detain the relator, and deliver him to the agent of the state of Illinois. Under the warrant the sheriff of Itasca county arrested the relator, but upon habeas corpus he was, by the court commissioner of that county, subsequently ordered discharged from custody. From that order the sheriff appealed to this court pursuant to the provision of Gen. Laws 1895, chap. 927. It now appears from an affidavit and "supplemental pleadings," filed in behalf of the relator, the allegations of which are not traversed by the sheriff, that since this appeal was taken the governor of Minnesota, upon a rehearing of the matter, made and issued an order directed to the sheriff of Itasca county annulling and revoking the warrant for the arrest of the relator, and directing the sheriff to make due return to him of that and all former orders, and that in pursuance of such order the sheriff has returned the warrant to the governor. The question that confronts us at the outset is whether the governor had the power to revoke his warrant, for, if he had, there is now no warrant in existence upon which the relator can be arrested or detained in custody. In that case he would necessarily have to be discharged, and it would be useless to review the action of the court commissioner. It is a matter of common knowledge that the governors of states have been and are in the habit of recalling and revoking such warrants whenever they become satisfied that they were improperly issued. The exercise of the assumed power to do this is so frequent, and of such long continuance, that it has become what may be not improperly called the common law of the country on the subject. The existence of this power has been so generally conceded that the question has not often come before the courts, but whenever it has they have invariably held that the governor of a state has this power. The question was, so far as we can ascertain, first judicially considered in Massachusetts by Justice Bigelow in 1837, and the power of a governor to revoke a warrant of rendition upheld, although, when the case was subsequently brought before the full court, the question was not decided. Wyeth v. Richardson, 10 Gray, 240. See also Re Carroll, 11 Chicago Legal News, 14. The only case we can find in which the question has been passed upon by the highest court of a state is Work v. Cornington, 84 Ohio St. 64, 32 Am. Rep. 845, in which, after an exhaustive review of executive and judicial precedents, the court held that, if a warrant for the surrender of a fugitive from justice is obtained in a case in which it should not have been issued, the governor may revoke it; and where a warrant has been revoked, no inquiry will be made in a proceeding on habeas corpus on behalf of the alleged fugitive as to the grounds of such revocation; also that this power is not limited to cases where the papers presented are insufficient or defective on their face. The views of the text-writers are of the same effect. Spear, Extradition, p. 440; Moore, Extradition, § 620. The principal argument of counsel against the existence of the power of the governor to revoke a warrant once issued is that under the Constitution of the United States, in the case of interstate extradition, the duty of the governor to issue a warrant on the production of the requisition in due form is imperative and ministerial, and not discretionary and judicial. We do not feel called upon to go into any extended discussion of the general subject of interstate rendition, and with the limited time at our command for investigation we are not prepared to do so. We will merely say that it is unquestionably true that when a case is presented which is clearly one contemplated by the Federal Constitution, the governor has no discretion, but it is his imperative duty to issue the warrant. That duty, however, is one of imperfect obligation, for, if the governor refuses to perform it, we know of no power, state or Federal, to compel him to do so. But we are not prepared to assent to the proposition that, in determining whether a case contemplated by the Constitution is presented, the governor upon whom the demand is made is vested with no discretion, even where the papers are on their face sufficient and in due form. We all know as a matter of fact that governors do exercise a discretion in such cases, and if they are satisfied that the demand is made for some ulterior and improper purpose—as, for example, the collection of a private debt—they refuse to issue a warrant. If a governor may exercise such a discretion in regard to issuing the warrant, we do not see why he may not exercise the same discretion in regard to revoking it; and, if he does revoke it, his reasons for so doing can no more be inquired into than his reasons for refusing to issue it in the first instance. The existence of the power to revoke would seem necessary, in order to prevent great abuses and wrongs. A warrant is, of necessity, almost always issued ex parte, and the governor is liable to be imposed upon by those demanding it, or, for some other cause, to issue it improvidently. It would seem that in such cases the same officer who had the exclusive power to issue the warrant should have the power to remedy the wrong by revoking it. Of course, to be effective for any purpose, the warrant must be revoked before the alleged fugitive is taken out of the state.

ADAMS EXPRESS COMPANY, Appt.

(..... Minn.)

1. That part of Gen. Stat. 1894, § 399, which provides that the courts may direct the manner in which notice may be given to the common carrier proceeded against, is not violative of the constitutional provision which forbids the delegation of legislative powers to the judiciary. Nor have legislative powers been delegated in § 5979, which provides that the court or judge allowing a writ of mandamus shall direct the manner of serving the same.
2. The provision in Gen. Stat. 1894, § 399, which authorizes the court to direct service to be made upon the agents or servants of the carrier, is not open to the objection that by such service an attempt is made to obtain jurisdiction over the carrier without due process of law.
3. At common law the courts have always possessed the right and authority to direct the manner of service of writs of mandamus, and with respect to service upon private corporations the rule has been that service should be made on the head officer or upon the select body or person within the corporation whose province it is to put in motion the machinery necessary to secure performance of the duty.
4. No reason exists why the rule above stated should not be applicable when service is to be made upon a joint-stock association.
5. In the case at bar an alternative writ of mandamus was issued, on the relation of the state railroad and warehouse commission, to compel the Adams Express Company, a nonresident, joint-stock association engaged in business in this state as a common carrier, to print and keep for public inspection schedules showing the classification, rates, fares, and charges for the transportation of property of all kinds and classes in force and charged by it in the state, and to file a copy of such schedule with the commission. When allowing the writ, the court directed that service be made upon one J. W. Owen, general agent of the company. Service was actually made upon Owen, but on the return day it was shown that he was not a general agent, but simply the local agent at St. Paul. No claim was made that the company had a general manager or general agent in this state, or any officer or agent superior to Owen; and it clearly appeared that all of the officers named in the articles of association, and all of the shareholders, were nonresidents of the state, and not within its borders. Held, that the service was sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the court issuing the writ to proceed with the hearing.

Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a proceeding, by an alternative writ of mandamus, to compel the Adams Express Company, doing business as a common carrier in this state, to print, and keep for public inspection, schedules showing the classification, rates, fares, and charges for the transportation of property of all kinds and classes in force and charged by it in this state, and to file a copy of such schedules with the railroad and warehouse commission. The writ was issued on the relation of the commission, relying on the provisions of Laws 1895, chap. 152, and the several laws therein referred to; and, when allowed by the court, it was ordered that service be made by delivering to, and leaving a copy of the writ of the petition and of the order for service with, J. W. Owen, general agent of the company. On the return day the company appeared specially, and moved to quash the writ on the ground that the court had not acquired jurisdiction over the company; such motion being based on all of the proceedings, and two affidavits, from which it appeared that Owen, on whom service had been made, was the local agent at St. Paul, and not the general agent, and that the company was not a corporation, but a joint stock association, organized in the state of New York, composed of a large number of shareholding members, all nonresidents. The motion being denied, the company appeals.

In directing that service be made in a certain specified way, the court below observed the requirements of Gen. Stat. 1894, § 5979, which provides that the court or judge, by an indorsement on the writ of mandamus, shall allow the same, designate the return day, and direct the manner of serving a copy of the writ, of the allowance thereof, and of any order or direction of the court, indorsed on the writ. It is also provided, by § 399, that whenever a common carrier refuses or neglects to obey any lawful order or requirement of the commission, made under the provisions of the statute under which it acts, an application may be made to the court, alleging such disobedience, and the court is given power to hear and determine the matter on short notice to the carrier; such notice to be served on the carrier, his or its officers or agents, or servants, in such manner as the court shall direct. That the regulation of the business conducted by common carriers is one over which the legislature has full power to act, and that ample authority can by law be conferred upon the railroad and warehouse commission to call on any carrier doing business within our borders, whether a natural or artificial person, resident or nonresident, for such information as is absolutely essential for the proper conduct of the carrier and the protection of the public, ought not to be questioned. Counsel does not contend to the contrary at this time, but his claim is that service of the writ made in the manner designated by the court, and as such service was attempted to be made in this instance, is insufficient to confer any jurisdiction over the company, a joint-stock association,—a copartnership,—as is claimed, none of its shareholders having been served, or having voluntarily appeared. It is urged in support of this contention that when the legislature attempted to confer upon the courts the power to determine the manner, or upon whom, writs of mandamus shall be served (§ 5979, supra), or the manner, or upon whom, the notice prescribed in § 399, supra, shall be served, it delegated its powers to the judiciary, and the latter branch of the government, when acting, assumes a power purely legislative, forbidden by the Constitution, or, if this position is not sustainable, that any statute which empowers or permits a court to direct that service of a writ or order based on an alleged disobedience or violation of a public duty by a common carrier may be made upon its agents or servants authorizes jurisdiction over such carrier to be obtained without due process of law,—also a violation of a constitutional right. If the claim last mentioned is well founded, a nonresident corporation, association, copartnership, or individual, engaged in business in this state as a common carrier, would seem to be beyond the reach of process of the courts, or orders emanating from the commission, unless an officer of the corporation, or a member of the association or of the partnership, or the single individual so engaged in business, should accidentally be found within our territorial limits, and personal service be thus obtained.

In substance, § 5979, regulating the service of the writ of mandamus, has been the statute of the state and its predecessor, the territory, since the enactment of Rev. Stat. 1851, chap. 88, § 8. A change in the phraseology was made, and the proviso added, by Gen. Laws 1875, chap. 68, § 2. So far as we know, the power of the legislature to authorize the courts to direct the manner in which service of a writ of mandamus should be made, or the authority of the court to make an order as to the manner of service, has not been questioned heretofore in any of the courts of this state. At common law the rule respecting the service of this writ upon a private corporation was that it should be made upon the head officer of the corporation, or upon that select body or person within the corporation whose province it was to put in motion the machinery necessary to secure performance of the duty commanded. The recent strictness of the common law also required that such service should be made within the jurisdiction of that sovereignty by which the corporation was created, but this strictness was long ago relaxed so as to permit service to be made within the jurisdiction wherein the corporation had engaged in business in all litigation connected with that business. And such is now the rule independently of statute, and no reasons exist why this relaxation should not be extended to the service of prerogative writs. State. Mercer County Chosen Freeholders, v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 42 N. J. L. 490. And there is no reason why service upon joint-stock associations should not be made in the same manner as service upon corporations. It may be, technically speaking, that such an association is nothing more than a copartnership formed between the shareholders, but this is immaterial. It is merely a question of definition, and they have been called "quasi corporations of a private character." 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 6. They are associations having some of the features of common-law partnerships, and many of the features of private corporations, as will be obvious upon an examination of defendant's articles of association, introduced upon the hearing below. We are not only confident that in authorizing the court to exercise the power of directing the manner in which service shall be made, as it has in both sections (399 and 5979), there has been no delegation of legislative powers, but that the courts, in the absence of a statute expressly regulating the subject, have always possessed the right and authority to direct the manner in which prerogative writs shall be served, and, in case of corporations, upon whom they should be served. Of course, we are not to be understood as saying that this power could be exercised arbitrarily and unreasonably. It must be within the rule of the common law as to service, heretofore stated. And, if service is made upon a corporation in accordance with that rule, such service is due process of law; for the real question is, Has the proper officer or representative of the corporate body received such a notice as will give it or him an opportunity to be heard? The error of defendant's counsel is in assuming that the proceedings adopted for the regulation of common carriers are to be classed with those usually arising in courts of justice, and that all steps taken must be in strict accordance with those which end in ordinary judgments, and also in assuming that, because defendant is a joint-stock association, it is wholly unlike a corporation. Certainly as to the service of orders issued by the commission, and of prerogative writs issued by the courts, no substantial distinction can be pointed out. Each has its officers, its board of directors, its general manager, and its general and local agents. If, at common law, service could properly be made upon the head officer or upon the person within the corporation who would be expected to obey the command, and be valid, why could not service be made upon a general or local agent of this nonresident association, and be valid, provided it is fairly to be inferred from the record that he came within the description? We have here an association of nonresidents, who have voluntarily assumed a position in the transaction of business which involves duties to the public. The duty in the present case grows out of the management of their business as a common carrier in this state, and is a public duty, which the association seeks to evade by asserting that the person upon whom service has been made is nothing more than a local agent in the city of St. Paul. Nor has the association been candid enough to suggest that it has any general manager or agent within the state upon whom service might be made with greater probability of reaching the association, or better prospect of obtaining jurisdiction. It would seem remarkable if, under such circumstances, the courts must be declared powerless to enforce the fulfilment of the important obligations which this and every other nonresident common carrier owes to the public. In the absence of any showing that defendant association has a general manager or general agent in this state, or any officer or agent superior to the one on whom this writ was served, we are justified in assuming that he was the person whose province it was to obey the command, to cause the schedules to be printed, and to file with the commission a copy of the same. As local agent at St. Paul, he undoubtedly had in his possession the schedules required, for he could not well transact business without them. If so, applying, by analogy, to a joint stock association the common law rule as to service of a writ of mandamus upon a corporation, we regard the service in question as sufficient for the court to proceed. What the remedy will be if the rule is made absolute, and a peremptory writ issued, we are not required to express any opinion.

Counsel for the state have contended that this service could be upheld under Gen. Stat. 1894, § 5200, while counsel for defendant insists that this statute is unconstitutional. The present law is the original act as amended (Gen. Laws 1891, chap. 79), and the amendatory act is attacked upon the ground that the subject is not expressed in the title. We need not determine this point, for, if the amendatory act does come within the constitutional inhibition, service was properly made under either of the sections heretofore commented on.

Order affirmed and case remanded.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

STATE of New Hampshire
v.
Ernest GERRY.

(.....N. H.....)

1. The attempt to give police courts concurrent jurisdiction with the supreme court in any criminal case where the fine does not exceed $300 and the term of imprisonment does not exceed one year, although the offenses thus punishable were not within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace in 1784, renders Laws 1895, chap. 117, unconstitutional, because it impairs the constitutional right of trial by jury and of a presentment or indictment before prosecution in cases in which such rights existed when the state Constitution was adopted.

NOTE.—For jury trial on appeal to satisfy the constitutional right to jury, see Miller v. Com. (Va.) 15 L. R. A. 441, and note; also Brown v. Epps (Va.) 27 L. R. A. 676.

2. A jury trial upon appeal does not answer the constitutional guaranty of a right to be tried by jury.

3. The court cannot eliminate an invalid provision for a recognizance from a statute providing therefor as a condition of appeal from a conviction in order to sustain the statute as authorizing an appeal without a recognizance.

4. The constitutional right to an accusation by information before being put on trial for a misdemeanor stands on the same ground, under Const. art. 88, as the right to indictment before being put on trial for felony.

(Clark, Wallace, and Pikes, JJ., dissent.)

(July 31, 1896.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Merrimack County Court denying his motion to dismiss an appeal from a judgment of a police justice convicting him of an aggravated assault for the alleged reason that the proceedings were beyond the jurisdiction of the police magistrate. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. F. Burbank, for defendant:

Chapter 117 of the Laws of 1895 is unconstitutional because it seriously impairs the right of jury trial.

The language of the Constitution is to be understood in the sense in which it was used at the time of its adoption. Opinion of Justices, 44 N. H. 635. At that time all criminal cases, except those of the most trivial character, were tried by jury. A person charged with as serious a crime as aggravated assault was by law and settled usage entitled to a jury trial, and his right to such a trial was unqualified, unfettered, unclogged, and absolute.

Copp v. Henniker, 55 N. H. 187, 20 Am. Rep. 194; 1 N. H. Prov. Papers, 887, 895, 450; 3 Prov. Papers, 183.

The defendant in this case not having been convicted "by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land," the conviction is void, and the appeal should be dismissed.

East Kingston v. Towle, 43 N. H. 64, 97 Am. Dec. 575, 2 Am. Rep. 174.

The present case being beyond the jurisdiction of a justice, this burden was not a incident to the defendant's constitutional right of jury trial.

Copp v. Henniker, 55 N. H. 202, 20 Am. Rep. 194; Saco v. Wentworth, 37 Me. 165, 58 Am. Dec. 786; Greene v. Briggs, 1 Curt. C. C. 311.

Messrs. W. D. Hardy, H. I. Goss, George B. Cox, J. W. Remick, and D. C. Remick for the State.

Carpenter, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An aggravated assault is punishable by a fine not exceeding $200, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both. Pub. Stat. chap. 278, § 21. If the police court had no jurisdiction to try and determine the question of the defendant's guilt or innocence of the offense charged in the complaint, the judgment is void, and the appeal must be dismissed. State v. Dolby, 49 N. H. 483, 6 Am. Rep. 539; State v. Runnals, 49 N. H. 498; State v. Thornton, 63 N. H. 114; State v. Perkins, 63 N. H. 89. By the act of March 29, 1895 (Laws 1895, chap. 117, § 1), jurisdiction of all criminal cases where the fine does not exceed $200, and the term of imprisonment does not exceed one year, is expressly conferred upon police courts; and if, under the Constitution, the legislature had the power to enact it, the defendant's motion to dismiss the appeal was properly denied. "No subject shall be arrested, imprisoned, despoiled, or deprived of his property, immunities, or privileges, put out of the protection of the law, exiled, or deprived of his life, liberty, or estate, but by the judgment of his peers or by the law of the land." Bill of Rights, art. 15. It has never been denied or doubted that by this article trial by jury according to the course of the common law is secured to the defendant in all criminal cases without exception. State v. Rye, 63 N. H. 406, 407, 56 Am. Rep. 529. It is the only provision of the Constitution relating to trial by jury for prosecutions for crimes not capital. 88 L. R. A.

Strike it out, and there is nothing to prevent the enactment of a statute providing that all criminal offenses now known to our law, except murder in the first degree, may be tried and determined without a jury by the supreme court, by a justice of the peace, or by a police court. The framers of the Constitution, who took care to secure a jury trial to the parties in a controversy over the smallest amount of property (Bill of Rights, art. 20; Const. 1792, art. 77), did not intend to leave in doubt the right of persons charged with an offense, however trivial (63 N. H. 407, 56 Am. Rep. 529), against the criminal law, to a like trial. Their language means what they understood it to mean: "The language of the Constitution is to be understood in the sense in which it was used at the time of its adoption." Opinion of Justices, 44 N. H. 633, 635, 41 N. H. 550, 551; Hale v. Everett, 53 N. H. 9, 170, 16 Am. Rep. 82; Copp v. Henniker, 55 N. H. 179, 193, 20 Am. Rep. 194; State, Rhodes v. Saunders, 66 N. H. 39, 76, 18 L. R. A. 646; State v. Griffin, 66 N. H. 326, 327. Whatever the parties to the Great Charter understood in 1215 to be the meaning of the words "by the judgment of his peers" (Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 529, 28 L. ed. 232, 236; 1 Stephen, Hist. Crim. Law Eng. 162; 1 Pol. & M. Hist. Eng. Law, 152, note, 518; Hall, Mid. Ages, 342, note), our fathers in 1784, as well as the first continental Congress, in 1774, understood them to mean trial by jury,—that they secured to them "the great and inestimable privilege of being tried by their peers of the vicinage according to the course" of the common law. 2 Kent, Com. 6. Such was the understanding of Coke when he wrote his commentary on the Great Charter. 2 Inst. 28, 29, 48–50. Precisely what significance is to be given to the words "or the law of the land" need not now be considered. Mayo v. Wilson, 1 N. H. 53, 56–59; Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 1 N. H. 111, 130; 2 Kent, Com. 13; Cooley, Const. Lim. 358, 356; 2 Inst. 50–52. Whatever may be their meaning, they do not restrict or qualify the right of trial by jury in prosecutions for crime. "The Constitution contains no definition or description of the trial by jury. . . . It is referred to in the Bill of Rights as an institution which constant practice from the earliest periods of the colonial history had made perfectly familiar to the people; and when trial by jury is spoken of in the Constitution the term must be understood to mean that method of trial according to the common law of England, and substantially such as was used and practised at that time in this state." Chief Justice Perley's charge to the grand jury at Plymouth, November, 1866. It "is a trial according to the course of the common law, and the same in substance as that which was in use when the Constitution was framed." East Kingston v. Towle, 43 N. H. 57, 64, 97 Am. Dec. 575, 2 Am. Rep. 174; Copp v. Henniker, 55 N. H. 179, 193–203, 20 Am. Rep. 194; King v. Hopkins, 57 N. H. 334, 350; Story, Const. § 1783. "The essentials of jury trial . . . are shown by common-law principles and by history." State, Rhodes v. Saunders, 66 N. H. 39, 76, 18 L. R. A. 646. "Accusations of criminal conduct are tried at the common law by jury; and wherever the right to this trial is guaranteed by the Constitution without qualification or restriction it must be understood as retained in all those cases which were triable by jury at the common law and with all the common-law incidents to a jury trial, so far, at least, as they can be regarded as tending to the protection of the accused." Cooley, Const. Lim. 4th ed. 394. It is essential to a jury trial that it be had in a court of competent jurisdiction presided over by a judge qualified to instruct the jury in matters of law. Pierce v. State, 13 N. H. 536, 566-569; State, Rhodes v. Saunders, 66 N. H. 39, 76, 18 L. R. A. 646. "Another excellency of this trial is: that the judge is always present at the time of the evidence given in it. Herein he is able in matters of law emerging upon the evidence to direct them, and also in matters of fact to give them a great light and assistance by his weighing the evidence before them, and observing where the question and knot of the business lies." Hale, Com. Law, 291, 292.

There must be a lawful accusation. This is as essential to a common-law trial by jury as any other incident,—as, for example, the number of the jurors, and the unanimity of their verdict. By the common law of the colony no one could be subjected to a trial for any criminal offense beyond the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, except upon an indictment returned by a grand jury in cases of felony, or in the case of misdemeanors, on such indictment, or upon an information filed by the attorney general. The English common law respecting appeals of murder and other crimes (4 Bl. Com. 812-816), and its rule that one found guilty of a felony by the verdict of a jury in a civil cause might, without other accusation, be put on trial for the crime (1 Chitty, Crim. L. 164, 165; Bacon, Abr. Indictment, B), were never adopted here. The provincial act of 1718 (Prov. Laws 1771, chap. 86), relating to the power and duty of coroners in taking inquisitions of death, was declaratory of the common law. Bacon, Abr. Coroner, C; 1 East, P. C. 381. It is not material to the present inquiry whether the colony adopted the English common-law doctrine that upon the inquisition alone one could be put on his trial for the homicide (4 Bl. Com. 801, 802) because a coroner's jury was a grand jury (1 Hale, P. C. 161, note; 2 Hale, P. C. 59; 2 Burn, Justice of the Peace [29th ed.] 29; Act 1718, supra; Act June 10, 1791; Laws 1797, p. 132), and their inquisition an indictment (2 Inst. 32, 550; 4 Coke, 46, 47; Reg. v. Ingham, 5 Best & S. 257, 270). If in colonial times or since there ever was such a trial, no record or historical mention of it has been produced. Without an accusation by indictment or information, no one could be tried or punished for any criminal offense not within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace. The required accusation was not a mere form of procedure, but a substantial protection of every citizen against false and malicious charges of crime; a valuable security of his "life, liberty, and estate," and of his enjoyment thereof. "As for trials in causes criminal, they have this further advantage: that regularly the accusation, as preparatory to a trial, is by a grand jury. So that, as no man's interest, according to the course of the common law, is to be tried or determined without the oaths of a jury of twelve men, so no man's life is to be tried but by the oaths of twelve men, and by the preparatory accusation or indictment by twelve men or more, precedent to his trial." Hale, Com. Law, 295. "In times of difficulty and danger more is to be apprehended from the violence and partiality of judges appointed by the Crown, in suits between the King and the subject, than in disputes between one individual and another, to settle the metes and boundaries of private property. Our law has therefore wisely placed this strong and twofold barrier, of a presentment and a trial by jury, between the liberties of the people and the prerogative of the Crown. . . . The founders of the English law have with excellent forecast contrived, that no man should be called to answer to the King for any capital crime unless upon the preparatory accusation of twelve or more of his fellow subjects, the grand jury; and that the truth of every accusation . . . should afterwards be confirmed by the unanimous suffrage of twelve of his equals and neighbors, indifferently chosen and superior to all suspicion. So that the liberties of England cannot but subsist so long as this palladium remains sacred and inviolate, not only from all open attacks, . . . but also from all secret machinations which may sap and undermine it by introducing new and arbitrary methods of trial by justices of the peace, commissioners of the revenue, and courts of conscience. And, however convenient these may appear at first, . . . let it be again remembered . . . that these inroads upon this sacred bulwark of the nation are fundamentally opposite to the spirit of our Constitution, and that, though begun in trifles, the precedent may gradually increase and spread, to the utter disuse of juries in questions of the most momentous concern." 4 Bl. Com. 349, 350. With this language of Blackstone the members of the bar who assisted in framing the Constitution in 1784 were familiar. His work was the chief, if not the only, legal text-book they possessed. It is morally certain that the people among their reserved rights did not intend to omit, and did not understand that they did omit, any part of this "twofold barrier" against oppression, this "sacred bulwark" of their liberties. "The grand jury perform most important public functions, and are a great security to the citizens against vindictive prosecutions either by the government, or by political partisans, or by private enemies." 2 Story, Const. § 1779. "If . . . the people are enlightened and honest, and zealous in defense of their rights and liberties, it will be impossible to surprise them into a surrender of a single valuable appendage of the trial by jury." Id. § 1785. "The right of individual citizens to be secure from an open and public accusation of crime, and from the trouble, expense, and anxiety of a public trial before a probable cause is established by the presentment and indictment of a grand jury, in case of high offenses, is justly regarded as one of the securities to the innocent against hasty, malicious, and oppressive public prosecutions, and as one of the ancient immunities and privileges of English liberty." Jones v. Robbins, 8 Gray, 329, 344.

In the case of misdemeanors, the requirement of an information filed by a sworn public officer, learned in the law, who has no motive "other than to protect and promote the public interest" (State v. Dover, 9 N. H. 472), and whose duty it is as much to secure the innocent from persecution as to prosecute the guilty, affords a protection against unfounded and malignant charges at least equal to that afforded by the grand jury in the case of felonies. It would be much greater than that of the latter if the proceedings and practice in the grand-jury room were the same here as in England, where, to prevent vexatious indictments for certain misdemeanors, it has been found necessary to provide by statute that no one shall lay before the grand jury a charge of certain misdemeanors without permission of a judge, the attorney general, or of the solicitor general, unless he is bound over to prosecute by a magistrate. The criminal code commissioners in 1879 recommended that the restriction be extended to all offenses. 1 Stephen, Hist. Crim. Law Eng. 293, 294. In this state grand juries have, it is believed, usually, if not always, been instructed not to return a bill against the accused unless upon the evidence laid before them—the state's evidence alone—they are satisfied of his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. 1 Chitty, Crim. L. 818; 4 Bl. Com. 303. But whether this is the true rule or not, the law that no man can be publicly arraigned and put on trial for any alleged crime upon the mere accusation of his neighbor, though made under oath, until the charge has been investigated, and found true, or probably true, by a grand jury of his fellows, or an impartial public officer, is an invaluable protection against false and malignant accusations of crime. In the exceptional class of cases referred to,—cases of which a justice of the peace in 1784 had jurisdiction,—the right of the accused was to obtain a jury trial by taking an appeal from the judgment of the justice on giving security to prosecute it, and paying costs. State v. Griffin, 66 N. H. 326. This burden upon the right of jury trial has been maintained under the Constitution upon the sole ground that it existed when the Constitution was adopted. Copp v. Henniker, 55 N. H. 179, 195, 196, 20 Am. Rep. 194. In all other cases trial by jury was free. The accused was not obliged to purchase, or even to demand, it. Without it, he could not be convicted or punished. It was his right not to be "deprived of life, liberty, or estate" for any criminal offense, until in the due course of the common law a verdict of guilty against him was obtained. The burden rested not upon him to procure either a trial or an acquittal. It rested on the state—the prosecution—to obtain a trial by jury, as well as a conviction by their verdict. If he pleaded not guilty, he was not, and could not be, required to do or say anything more. The law esteemed him innocent until a verdict to the contrary was rendered. The common law—the words of the Great Charter—assured him that he should not be condemned or punished for any criminal offense until a verdict of guilty by a jury of his equals was first obtained against him. That the common-law right of trial by jury in criminal cases as it existed here in 1784, with all its incidents, "so far, at least, as they can be regarded as tending to the protection of the accused," is secured to the people by the Constitution, is not open to doubt. It is established by numerous judgments of the court, and is not questioned by the counsel for the state.

The question presented is whether this right is infringed or substantially impaired by the act of March 29, 1895 (Laws 1895, chap. 117), which provides that "police courts shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the supreme court in any criminal case where the fine does not exceed $200 and the term of imprisonment does not exceed one year. In case of an appeal in any case which is beyond the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, the appellant shall enter into recognizance as in other cases in any sum not less than $100, nor more than $300." It is not claimed that offenses punishable by such a fine or term of imprisonment were, in 1784, within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace. In substance, the act (on the interpretation most favorable to the state) declares that a person accused in the cases specified may be tried, found guilty, and condemned to the prescribed punishment by a police judge, subject only to the right of appeal provided by the general law as follows: "A person sentenced for an offense by a police court . . . may at the time such sentence is declared appeal therefrom to the supreme court at the trial term next to be holden for the county. Before the appeal is allowed the appellant shall enter recognizance with sufficient sureties in a reasonable sum, not exceeding $100, to appear at the court of appeal, to prosecute his appeal with effect, to abide the order of the court thereon, and, if so required, to be of good behavior in the meantime. If the appellant fails to enter and prosecute his appeal . . . his recognizance shall be declared forfeited, and the clerk . . . shall transmit to the . . . police court appealed from a certificate of such forfeiture. The justice shall record such certificate, shall add to the costs fees for copies sent to the clerk, 50 cents for the clerk's certificate, and 50 cents for recording it; and he shall issue a mittimus to carry into effect the original sentence with such increased costs." Pub. Stat. chap. 253, §§ 2-4. If, because of his poverty, or because he is a stranger in a strange land, or for other reason, he is unable to obtain sufficient sureties, or to pay the required fees, the accused has no appeal, and no jury trial. If he secures his appeal, but is unable, or for any cause fails, to enter and prosecute it, not only is the sentence of the police court affirmed, but he is charged with additional costs, and his recognizance is forfeited. In other words, for taking and failing to pursue his appeal he is subjected, not only to the original sentence, but also to the penalty of paying costs, and the amount of his recognizance. The only ground upon which it has been held or claimed that under the Constitution the right of jury trial may be subjected to these burdens is that in 1784 they existed by law in cases within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace; that it is, with these burdens upon it, the same trial, in substance, as that which was in use in those cases when the Constitution was framed. It is not questioned that the imposition of these burdens on the right of jury trial in any other cases forbidden by the Constitution. "If, in a class of criminal cases, at the date of the Constitution, a defendant was entitled to a jury trial upon his complying with the single condition of remaining in custody, or giving security for his appearance merely, as he might elect, his constitutional right would be infringed by such a material alteration of the terms on which he can enjoy the right, as making his enjoyment of it depend upon his paying a jury fee, or the costs of the prosecution, or giving security for his appearance without the option of remaining in custody, or giving security for anything else than his appearance, or incurring the risk of increased punishment, or submitting to anything else that would operate as a penalty for the exercise of the right." Copp v. Henniker, 55 N. H. 179, 202, 20 Am. Rep. 194; State v. Griffin, 66 N. H. 326, 328, and cases cited.

But it is suggested that the court may grant an appeal without requiring the defendant to comply with the requirements of the law regulating appeals; that an appeal may be allowed upon the defendant's merely recognizing for his appearance, as in cases where he is bound over to answer. The statute admits of only two possible constructions. It either does or does not confer the right of appeal. If it does not, nobody contends that it can be sustained. If it does, it gives the appeal provided by the general law. This is undoubtedly the true construction. It is what the legislature intended. The statute is to be read precisely as if the general law of appeal were repeated in it and re-enacted. But there was no occasion for re-enacting the general law. Statutes are construed in view of the existing law. The general law of appeal—the provision that any person sentenced by a police court may appeal therefrom—extends to every case created by subsequent legislation that falls within it. Roberts v. Stark, 47 N. H. 223, 225; State v. Rum, 51 N. H. 373; State v. Rann, 63 N. H. 249. An appeal from a subordinate tribunal's determination of fact is unknown to the common law. It exists only by statute. Wetherbee v. Johnson, 14 Mass. 412, 420; Com. v. Richards, 17 Pick. 295, 296; United States v. Wanson, 1 Gall. 5, 14, 15; State v. White, 41 N. H. 194, 196. The court cannot allow an appeal where none is provided, nor can it dispense with any of the prescribed conditions of an appeal that is provided. When the legislature declares that before an appeal is granted the appellant shall enter into a recognizance, the court cannot say that it shall be granted without a recognizance. For appeal on condition the court cannot substitute appeal without condition. For the appeal intended and provided by the legislature the court cannot substitute an appeal which the legislature did not intend. The court cannot lawfully legislate. Undoubtedly, "when a statute may constitutionally operate upon certain persons, or in certain cases, and was not evidently intended to conflict with the Constitution, it is not to be held unconstitutional merely because there may be persons to whom, or cases in which, it cannot constitutionally apply; but it is to be deemed constitutional, and to be construed not to apply to the latter persons or cases, on the ground that courts are bound to presume that the legislature did not intend to violate the Constitution." Opinion of Justices, 41 N. H. 553, 555. This is merely saying that a statute is to be held unconstitutional in those particulars only that conflict with the Constitution. So, "where there are different provisions in the same statute so distinct and independent that the one may not have been the motive or inducement to the other, one may be held valid and the other" unconstitutional and void. Jones v. Robbins, 8 Gray, 329, 338; Nolans' Case, 122 Mass. 330, 332, 333. A statute made in express terms both retrospective and prospective may be held valid so far as it looks to the future and void so far as it affects past transactions. Kent v. Gray, 53 N. H. 576; Rockport v. Walden, 54 N. H. 167, 20 Am. Rep. 181. Undoubtedly, "whatever may be the language of the legislature" in any case, "the court is bound to presume that it intended to keep within the limits of the Constitution." Leavitt v. Loering, 64 N. H. 607, 608, 1 L. R. A. 58. In other words, if the language of the statute is capable of being so construed as to be consistent with the Constitution, the court is bound to give it that construction. If not capable of such construction, all the court can do is to pronounce it void. This is the whole extent of the doctrine. It affords no warrant for giving the statute a meaning that the legislature did not intend. It does not authorize the addition to the statute of such words, provisions, or modifications not therein expressed or implied as may be necessary to render it consistent with the Constitution. If it did, an unconstitutional statute would be impossible. By addition or subtraction its defects could always be cured. For example, in Perkins v. Toole, 58 N. H. 425, § 23, chapter 231, of the General Statutes, extending the provision for actions by a landlord against a tenant to cases where that relation does not exist, was held unconstitutional, because by § 17 of the act the defendant is required, before his appeal is allowed, to recognize with sufficient sureties to enter and prosecute his appeal, to pay all rent then due or which may become due, and such damages and costs as may be awarded against him, thereby imposing upon his right of trial by jury an unwarranted burden. The objection could have been easily cured by striking out of § 17 the requirement of a recognizance, if the court had the power. It is, in this particular, impossible to distinguish that case from the present. If the provision for a recognizance can be stricken out here, it could and ought to have been in that case. If, under the statute now in question, the court can give the defendant an appeal without costs, free of all the conditions prescribed by the statute, it could and ought to have given the defendant in that case such an appeal, and have sustained the statute, so far, at least, as the ground upon which it was decided was concerned. So, a statute authorizing searches without a warrant might be sustained as constitutional by judicially incorporating in it article 19 of the Bill of Rights, or, perhaps, a statute giving a justice of the peace jurisdiction of all felonies (Const. art. 4) by supplying, by judicial legislation, provisions for the attendance at his court of grand and petit juries. State v. Peterson, 41 Vt. 504, 523. If the court had the power to repeal the statute imposing burdens upon the appeal, if in defiance of the legislative will it could give, or if the legislature should give, the accused "an unobstructed and unclogged right of appeal," the statute in question would not be free from constitutional objection. The obligation to appeal is itself a burden unwarranted by the Constitution.

By the statutes of Massachusetts the appellant from the sentence of a justice of the peace or police court is required to recognize with sureties to appear at the court appealed to until the final sentence or order of that court, to abide such final sentence or order, and not depart without leave, and in the meantime to keep the peace and be of good behavior. He is subjected to no costs of taking or prosecuting his appeal, unless upon his trial he is convicted. If he "fails to enter and prosecute his appeal, he shall be defaulted on his recognizance, . . . and the superior court may award sentence against him for the offense whereof he was convicted, in like manner as if he had been convicted in that court." Gen. Stat. chap. 173, §§ 1-5. On such default a more severe punishment than that imposed by the police court may be awarded him. Batchelder v. Com. 109 Mass. 361. In Jones v. Robbins, 8 Gray, 329 (decided in 1857), it was held by a divided court that article 12 of the Massachusetts Bill of Rights (identical with our article 15, except that it contains the additional provision that "the legislature shall not make any law that shall subject any person to . . . infamous punishment . . . without trial by jury") was not infringed by a statute authorizing a police court to try and pass sentence upon persons charged with an offense punishable by infamous punishment, subject to the right of appeal provided by the statutes above cited. The court also held that these statutes conferred on the appellant "an unqualified and unfettered right of appeal." The decision rests upon the mistaken view that the constitutional right of trial by jury is a privilege to be asserted, instead of an unconditional immunity from sentence or punishment for crime, until at the hands of a jury a verdict of guilty is obtained. The court, after stating in substance that the last clause of article 12, prohibiting the legislature from making any law which shall subject any person to infamous punishment without trial by jury, was "added for greater caution," and though more explicit than the preceding clause, "judgment of his peers," did not materially modify its meaning, say (p. 341): "As the object of the clause is to secure a benefit to the accused, which he may avail himself of or waive, at his own election, and as the purpose of the provision is to secure the right without directing the mode in which it shall be enjoyed, it is not violated by an act of legislation which authorizes a single magistrate to try and pass sentence, provided the act contains a provision that the party shall have an unqualified and unfettered right of appeal, and a trial by jury in the appellate court, subject only to the common liability to give bail, or to be committed to jail, to insure his appearance and to abide the judgment of the court appealed to. This is a necessary inconvenience, as is also the delay of the trial till the sitting of such court. They are the same and no greater than they would be in case the magistrate, instead of passing sentence, should, on examination, bind the accused over, or, as the necessary alternative, commit him to jail." A fatal objection to this doctrine is that it puts the burden of obtaining a jury trial upon the defendant, instead of the state. It compels him to appear, and demand the trial, without which the Constitution expressly declares he shall not be condemned. The difference between a right to jury trial upon demand made therefor and the right not to be convicted or punished until a trial is had is wide. A man is not to be imprisoned or otherwise punished because a corrupt or ignorant magistrate has found him guilty of crime, and he has not sufficient intelligence to demand and take the proper steps to obtain a trial by jury. As long as he remains entirely passive, as long as he neither does nor says anything relative to the charge against him, except to maintain his innocence by a plea of not guilty, he is assured by the express terms of the Constitution that he cannot be condemned until the state has obtained a verdict of guilty from twelve of his neighbors. "No subject shall be . . . deprived of life, liberty, or estate but by the judgment of his peers." This language does not mean—it cannot reasonably be construed to mean—that he may be tried and finally condemned by a magistrate unless he takes certain prescribed measures to secure a constitutional trial. To say that the required recognizance upon an appeal subjects the party to no greater inconvenience is no greater burden than the recognizance required upon an examination and binding over, if it were true, does not conclude the matter. It is not merely the recognizance, but the judgment of the magistrate, the sentence without a jury trial, that is in question. But it is not true. In legal effect, the difference between recognizances upon a binding over and upon an appeal is great. In the first case the sole consequence of a default or forfeiture is to create a debt in the amount of the recognizance, payment of which may be enforced. Upon the forfeiture of the recognizance taken on appeal not only is the defendant subjected to the payment of the amount of the recognizance, but he is also, under the Massachusetts statute, sentenced for the offense charged by the court appealed to, as if he had been convicted in that court. By his default he is held to waive a jury trial. Com. v. Whitney, 108 Mass. 5-7. If this is sound constitutional law, the legislature may enact a statute providing that a person bound over on examination, who forfeits his recognizance, or who in default of a recognizance is committed to jail, and escapes, may be brought in on a capias, and sentenced for the offense charged, as if he were convicted. It might dispense with the examination and recognizance, and provide that a person charged with crime, who fails to appear upon a simple notice or summons, may be brought in, and judgment rendered against him upon default, as in civil actions. In each case he would be no more deprived of a jury trial than is the appellant. If he should appear, and demand a jury trial, it would be accorded him. Trial by a magistrate, trial without a jury, is, in a constitutional sense, no trial; and no reason appears why, upon the forfeiture of a recognizance, the court may not be authorized to pronounce final sentence as well without as with such a trial. The consequence of the forfeiture of the appellant's recognizance under our statute (Pub. Stat. chap. 252, § 4) is, in effect, the same as it was in Massachusetts in 1857, except that there he might receive a more severe sentence than that appealed from. The difference is immaterial to the constitutional question.

The opinion of the majority of the court in Jones v. Robbins makes no answer to these views, nor to those expressed by Thomas, J., dissenting, who says (pp. 351-358): "I concur also in the opinion [of the majority] that the citizen cannot be subjected to trial for an offense visited by a capital or infamous punishment, without the intervention of a grand jury, which, standing between him and the power of the government and the passions of the prosecutor, shall say, upon their oaths, that there is good cause why he shall be subjected to trial. But there is, to myself, plainer and more solid ground upon which the conclusion rests, that a police court, or a justice of the peace, cannot be clothed with jurisdiction to try the citizen for an offense which will subject him to a capital or infamous punishment. It is obvious to remark that, if the intervention of a grand jury is all that is wanting to the validity of this jurisdiction, the legislature might at once provide for the return of indictments into the police court, and, reserving to the accused the right of appeal, might subject him to trial even for his life, before a single magistrate. I find it impossible to assent to any such conclusion, or to any reasoning that would lead to it. It seems to me plain that when the Constitution declares that 'the legislature shall not make any law that shall subject any person to a capital or infamous punishment . . . without trial by jury,' its meaning is trial by jury when and wheresoever he shall be tried; not upon his second trial, nor after having been subjected to another and different mode of trial. If, for an offense subjecting him to capital or infamous punishment, the citizen may be tried once without a jury, it is not easy to see why he may not be so tried a second time; why the legislature may not provide that, upon appeal to the municipal court, he may be tried by a single judge, and postpone his trial by jury to his appeal to this court. Such a law would, indeed, clog and obstruct his trial by jury; but the difference between that and this is in degree only. The subjecting the accused to one trial by a single magistrate obstructs the right of trial by jury, and essentially impairs its value. It places between the accused and a trial by jury a barrier not necessary for the security of the public, such as are the preliminary examination and holding to bail. . . . It subjects him to unnecessary, and often fatally burdensome, expense before he can reach the tribunal by which it is his right and his security to be tried. The subject cannot be said, under such a law, to obtain his right 'freely, and without being obliged to purchase it; completely, and without any denial; promptly, and without delay.' When you state the proposition that a man may be constitutionally tried for murder by a justice of the peace or a police court, or by any single judge, even after indictment, and that he cannot have a trial by jury until he has been tried by a single magistrate, I think every mind familiar with the Constitution, and with the common-law rights secured by it, shrinks from the conclusion; yet it is to be observed that the 12th article of the Bill of Rights makes no distinction between laws subjecting the citizen to capital and those subjecting him to infamous punishment. They stand on the same ground. . . . It is not an unobstructed and unclogged right of appeal, which the 12th article secures, but an unobstructed and unclogged right of trial by jury." To these weighty words of Judge Thomas no satisfactory reply has ever been made.

The doctrine of Jones v. Robbins has not found favor. It is repudiated by the highest courts of the land. The question first arose in the United States district court of New York in Re Dana, 7 Ben. 1, 4, 5, decided in 1878. Dana was charged by information in the police court of the District of Columbia with having published a libel, and was arrested in New York. A warrant to authorize his being taken to Washington was refused on the ground that he would there be tried in a manner forbidden by the Constitution; that is to say, in the police court, without a jury, subject to a right of appeal to the supreme court of the District, and there be tried by jury. Blatchford, J., said the offense of libel is "one of the crimes which must, under the Constitution, be tried by a jury. The act of 1870 provides that the information in this case shall not be tried by a jury; but shall be tried by the court. It is true that it gives to the defendant, after judgment, . . . the right to appeal to another court, where the information must be tried by a jury, but this does not remove the objection. If Congress has the power to deprive the defendant of his right to trial by jury for one trial, and to put him, if convicted, to an appeal to another court, to secure a trial by jury, it is difficult to see why it may not also have the power to provide for several trials by a court without a jury on several successive convictions before allowing a trial by a jury. In my judgment, the accused is entitled, not to be first convicted by a court and then to be acquitted by a jury, but to be convicted or acquitted in the first instance by a jury." The case is cited and approved in Callan v. Wilson (1887) 127 U. S. 540, 554, 555, 82 L. ed. 223, 228, where it was unanimously held that a person accused of conspiracy is entitled, under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, to a trial by jury, and that an act of Congress providing that he may be tried, convicted, and sentenced by the police court of the District of Columbia subject to a right of appeal to the supreme court of the District, is unconstitutional and void. The court say (pages 556, 557, 127 U. S. and pages 228, 229, 82 L. ed.): "The argument made in behalf of the government implies that, if Congress should provide the police court with a grand jury, and authorize that court to try without a petit jury all persons indicted—even for crimes punishable by confinement in the penitentiary—such legislation would not be an invasion of the constitutional right of trial by jury, provided the accused, after being tried and sentenced in the police court, is given an unobstructed right of appeal to, and trial by jury in, another court to which the case may be taken. We cannot assent to that interpretation of the Constitution. Except in that class or grade of offenses called petit offenses, which, according to the common law, may be proceeded against summarily in any tribunal legally constituted for that purpose, the guaranty of an impartial jury to the accused in a criminal prosecution conducted either in the name or by or under the authority of the United States secures to him the right to enjoy that mode of trial from the first moment, and in whatever court he is put on trial for the offense charged. In such cases a judgment of conviction, not based upon a verdict of guilty by a jury, is void. To accord to the accused a right to be tried by a jury, in an appellate court, after he has been once fully tried otherwise than by a jury, in the court of original jurisdiction, and sentenced to pay a fine, or be imprisoned for not paying it, does not satisfy the requirements of the Constitution." However free and unobstructed the right of appeal may be, it subjects the accused to the trouble, expense, and anxiety of two trials on the issue of guilt or innocence, instead of one.

It is said that a trial by the magistrate instead of an examination is "rather a benefit to the accused than a burden or disadvantage to him," because on a trial he must be discharged if a "reasonable doubt of his guilt is not removed," while on examination he "must be held for probable cause," and that no more bail would be required on his appeal from a conviction than upon a binding over for his appearance. State v. Craig, 80 Me. 85, 89. But the question is upon the effect of the statute in the case of a conviction, not in the case of acquittal. The constitutional guaranty is not that the accused shall not be acquitted, but that he shall not be convicted and punished without a jury trial. Com. v. Graves, 112 Mass. 282. An examination is not a trial. The holding to bail thereupon is not even an accusation. It is merely a finding that, before the defendant is formally accused of the crime, the question of his guilt or innocence ought to be investigated by a competent tribunal, namely, the grand jury. 1 Chitty, Crim. L. 89. It adds nothing to the weight of the complainant's charge. The defendant may, without prejudice to his rights, or stain upon his reputation, other than that caused by the charge alone, waive an examination, and recognize without a hearing. It may be said that he may also waive a trial, and take his appeal. Possibly he may, but he goes forth as a convicted criminal, with merely a right to a new trial. He stands morally, and in respect to his character and good name, as if, after a jury's verdict of guilty, he is awarded a new trial. This is a hardship to which by the common law of England and the common law of the colony in 1784 he could not be subjected. The court in State v. Craig were apparently of opinion that no burden not pecuniary is or can be in law an unjustifiable burden upon the jury trial of the Constitution. In the minds of a great majority of mankind a stain upon their reputation or a blot on their character is a heavier burden than any mere pecuniary loss. If the award of an unobstructed jury trial upon appeal answers the constitutional guaranty in one class of cases, it does in all. To sustain this statute will establish it as the constitutional law of the state that a police court may, if the legislature think fit, be invested with authority to try and determine all felonies, including murder, subject only to the right of appeal. The constitutional right to an accusation by information before being put on trial for a misdemeanor stands on the same ground as the right to indictment before being put on trial for a felony. Informations and indictments are classed together in the Constitution. Const. art. 88. If the former may be abolished, so may the latter, and, with them, grand juries. All the barriers which the common law interposed between malicious and groundless charges and a public trial may be removed. Anyone owing a grudge against his neighbor, by his mere accusation of crime, no matter how false and malignant, may compel him to undergo the humiliation and shame of being publicly arraigned and tried on the question of his guilt or innocence. In and prior to 1784 a justice of the peace had authority to try and determine, subject to appeal, those criminal offenses only that were punishable by a fine not exceeding 40 shillings, by whipping, or setting in the stocks. 1 Prov. Papers, 393, 395; 3 Prov. Papers, 187, 224; Prov. Laws 1761, pp. 1, 2, 48, 49; Prov. Laws 1771, pp. 9, 11, 16-18, 30, 31, 39, 40, 43, 52, 60. By the act of December 18, 1812 (Laws 1815, p. 328, § 3), a justice was authorized to punish larceny of property not exceeding $6.67 in value by a fine of $10 or imprisonment not exceeding thirty days. By the Revised Statutes he was given authority to try and determine all cases where the punishment was by fine not exceeding $10 (Rev. Stat. chap. 223, § 1), certain cases punishable by imprisonment not exceeding thirty days (Id. chap. 113, § 15), and certain others punishable by imprisonment not exceeding six months (Id. chap. 116, §§ 2, 3). In the revision of 1867 a justice was given jurisdiction of all offenses where the punishment is by fine not exceeding $20 or by imprisonment not exceeding six months or by both. Commissioner's Report, chap. 235, § 4; Gen. Stat. chap. 234, § 4.

The question of the constitutionality of this apparently increased jurisdiction of a justice of the peace has never been raised. Whether it is to be or may be sustained on the ground that the increase is ostensible rather than actual, that $10 in 1812 and 1842 and $20 in 1867 was no more in value than 40 shillings in 1784, and that imprisonment in jail for six months is not more than a just and reasonable equivalent for the barbarous punishment of a public whipping and setting in the stocks, or on the ground of usage and acquiescence. Pierce v. State, 13 N. H. 536, 573; Copp v. Henniker, 65 N. H. 179, 209, 20 Am. Rep. 194; King v. Hopkins, 57 N. H. 384, 356; Keniston v. State, 63 N. H. 87, 88; Boston, O. & M. R. Co. v. State, 62 N. H. 648, 649; State v. Bowditch, 18 Vt. 402, 413), is a question not raised, and not necessary to be considered.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

Charles H. McCANN, Plff in Err.,
v.

CONSOLIDATED TRACTION COM-

(59 N. J. L. 481.)

*1. If a servant is acting in the execution of the orders of his master, and by his negligence causes injury to a third party, the master will be responsible, although the act of the servant was not necessary for the proper performance of his duty to his master, or was even contrary to the orders of his master.

2. Anyone who undertakes to propel a street-railway car in a condition in which a reasonably prudent man would apprehend that it would frighten horses is bound to employ reasonable means to prevent injury to persons riding or driving along the street.

3. Where black coats were hanging on a projection at the side of a street water sprinkler operated by electricity by, along, and on the tracks of an electric street railway, and the coats, by waving to and fro in the wind, or by operation of the car sprinkler along the tracks, frightened a well-broken horse of gentle disposition, and caused injury to the plaintiff, who was thrown from his carriage, the question whether the employees of the defendant, the street-railway company, were in the exercise of reasonable care to prevent injury in operating such street-car sprinkler, and the consequent liability of the company for the injuries to the plaintiff, is a question which the trial court must submit to the jury for their determination, even though it be that the coats belonged to such employees, and were by them hung upon the projection of the car. The car being in such a condition as to cause fright to the horse and consequent injury to the plaintiff, it became a question for the jury to determine whether the defendant company was negligent in the performance of its duty to exercise reasonable care, by its servants, in the use of the public street, by operating the car while in this condition.

4. Quære: Can the operation of a street-railway car, painted a conspicuously bright and attractive color, along a public street, causing fright to a horse, with injury resulting therefrom, constitute negligence on the part of the street-railway company, and render it answerable for injuries resulting from such cause?

(March 9, 1897.)

ERROR to the Essex County Circuit to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the frightening of plaintiff's horse through defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Howard W. Hayes, for plaintiff in error:

Defendant was operating the sprinkler, with the coats hanging on it, and it was an unusual object, and calculated to frighten a well-broken horse. That is enough evidence of negligence to go to the jury.

Mallory v. Griffey, 85 Pa. 275; Jeffrey v. St. Pancras Vestry, 68 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 618; Watkins v. Reddin, 2 Fost. & F. 629; Harris v. Mobbs, L. R. 8 Exch. Div. 268; Phelon v. Stiles, 43 Conn. 426; Howe v. Young, 16 Ind. 812; Smith, Mast. & S. Blackstone's ed. p. 295.

Mr. Joseph Coult, for defendant in error:

The natural presumption was that the coats belonged to the employees operating the sprinkler, and that the defendant company was not responsible for their unauthorized acts not within the scope of their employment.

Smith, Mast. & S. 4th ed. 1886, p. 299; Walton v. New York Cent. Sleeping Car Co. 139 Mass. 556.

Lippincott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries. The defendant in error (the defendant below) operates an electric street car line of railway in the city of Newark. On the line of its street railway, and on the tracks thereof, the defendant company, at times, for the purpose of allaying dust, operates a water sprinkler. This car or tank is propelled by electricity, and operated and managed by a motorman and one or two other employees of the defendant. It is a car upon which a large tank of water is placed. On August 11, 1895, the plaintiff in error was driving a horse, attached to a low top buggy, along Washington avenue, one of the streets upon which the car was being operated, when his horse took fright at the car, became unmanageable, and turned sharply around, and threw the plaintiff out of the buggy, and severely injured him. At the conclusion of the evidence on the part of the plaintiff, the trial judge, on motion of defendant, directed a nonsuit.

The evidence of the plaintiff shows that the horse was a well-broken animal, and of a gentle disposition, and although very often, both day and night, it had been driven on the streets in the presence of the ordinary electric cars, had never before become frightened by them. The plaintiff was driving along Washington avenue to the north, while the sprinkling car was approaching from the opposite direction. When about 25 feet apart, the horse became frightened. The plaintiff, in his evidence, says that the car was "an enormous big tank, they had on trial there, painted yellow." The evidence also shows that upon a projection of the car, at or near the rear thereof, there were hanging two black coats, which, by the motion of the car, were caused to swing to and fro, and wave in the air something like a flag. The plaintiff describes them as a blanket, which kept swinging out. Other witnesses speak of the objects as coats hung upon a projection from the side of the car at the rear thereof, which, from the motion of the car, swung to and fro. An ordinary electric car was going in the same direction as the plaintiff, while the tank car was approaching in the opposite direction. The cars passed each other, and, when the tank car came in view, the horse stopped, turned sharply around, and threw the plaintiff out. The horse, after so turning around, became at once manageable, and the plaintiff was afterwards driven home in the buggy. The plaintiff testifies that the swinging coats on the sprinkler scared the horse. The plaintiff, with the horse, on this same day, had passed the ordinary electric cars, to which the horse had paid no attention. Some evidence was admitted, over objection, to show that the car was in a condition, both by reason of the bright yellow color, and because of the moving coats thereon, calculated to frighten an ordinary well-broken horse. It is not here intended to consider the admissibility of the evidence that the color of the car was calculated to frighten horses, and it is not deemed in any sense to have been the cause of the accident to the plaintiff in this case. Upon this motion to nonsuit it must be taken as an indisputable conclusion that the black coats were hanging on the projection of the sprinkler, waving to and fro; and whether the operation of the sprinkler in this condition by the employees of the defendant in charge of it constituted negligence, causing the horse to be frightened, and consequent injury to the plaintiff, was a question which should have been submitted to the jury.

The defendant's right to use a sprinkler upon its tracks for lawful purposes cannot be denied. It has as much authority in law to use the sprinkler as it has to operate its ordinary traction cars, but its use of the highway in this manner must be exercised with reasonable care, and thus so far protect from injury others who are in the lawful use of the street; and this reasonable care is as well applicable to the condition in which the cars are operated as to the mere act of operation or propulsion along the street. If the sprinkler was in a condition calculated to frighten the horse, and thus cause injury, it certainly became a question for the jury to determine whether the defendant had neglected to exercise reasonable care in this respect or not. The liability for injuries resulting from horses being frightened by unusual sights in the highway caused by a defendant has been distinctly recognized, and the question whether the defendant was making a negligent use of the highway, to the injury of the plaintiff, was one which required that the learned trial judge submit it to the jury.

There was a contention of the plaintiff that the conspicuous color of the sprinkler caused the fright of the horse and injury. This cause of liability has been suggested in some cases (Jeffrey v. St. Pancras Vestry, 63 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 618); but this contention under the evidence here has not been considered, because the trial judge directed the motion to nonsuit, upon the assumption that it had been established that the swaying of the coats caused the fright of the horse, and consequent injury to the plaintiff. The nonsuit by the trial judge was based upon two grounds: First, that there was no evidence that the coats were owned by the employees of the defendant, operating the car; and, secondly, if they did belong to such employees, still the act of hanging them upon the projection at the side of the sprinkler was not an act authorized by the defendant company, nor was it an act done in the course of the employment of the servants of the defendant in operating the sprinkler, and therefore no liability on the part of the defendant had been established. The gravamen of the action was that the sprinkler was being operated by the employees while in a dangerous condition; that is, in a condition calculated to frighten the horse. There is no evidence as to who hung the coats upon the projection, but the fact is well established that they had been hanging in this condition for some time previous to the time of the accident, and the car was being operated with them in this position. It would seem as if it was not material whether these coats were placed there by the defendant company, by its employees, or by a stranger, so long as the existence of them in this position created a dangerous situation, of which the employees of the defendant had knowledge, and still continued to operate the car. The fact is that they were upon a car sprinkler of the defendant company, which was being operated by its employees, who were bound to the exercise of reasonable care in its operation, and thus protect others from injury. It was conceded on this motion that a car with these coats swaying upon it was calculated to frighten a well-trained horse of gentle disposition; but, whether conceded or not on this motion to nonsuit, the fact must be considered, and it certainly remained for the jury to determine whether reasonable care had been exercised in the operation of the sprinkler. Besides, the master is liable for all incidental acts of his employees in the course of his employment; and if the coats were worn by the motorman or other employees, as necessary to be worn in the work of operation of the sprinkler, then the act of hanging them upon this projection was an act incidental to their employment and would render the company responsible for such an act; and if such an act created a dangerous condition, in its further operation, there is no known rule of law to be invoked to protect the defendant from the responsibility for the injurious results of such operation; and, generally speaking, the defendant company owed the duty to the plaintiff to exercise reasonable care to keep the sprinkler in a condition that injury should not arise to others; and if its employees used it when it was in a dangerous condition, or they themselves, in operating it, did that which rendered it dangerous, the defendant company became liable for the consequences. Phelon v. Stiles, 43 Conn. 426. In these respects the question for the jury would have been whether reasonable care had been exercised, and it is this question which, under this evidence, should have been submitted to the jury. Comben v. Belleville Stone Co. 59 N. J. L. 226, and cases cited.

In Mallory v. Griffee, 85 Pa. 275, the questions whether the fright of a horse was occasioned by a large stone along the highway, and whether it was calculated to frighten an ordinary, quiet, and well broken horse, and whether the defendant was negligent in placing such stone there, were left to the jury. Jeffrey v. St. Pancras Vestry, 68 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 618, was a case where a steam roller frightened plaintiff's horse, by puffing out steam. The question of recovery was held to have been properly submitted to the jury. In this latter case, Collin, J., speaking of the construction of a carriage for use on a highway, says: "But, on the other hand, if he has his carriage constructed and painted in such a manner as to be very conspicuous indeed, it might then become a nuisance." Liability has been established where a horse was frightened by a plow being left alongside a public road. Harris v. Mobbs, L. R. 8 Exch. Div. 268; where the noise and appearance of a steam engine were calculated to frighten horses (Watkins v. Reddin, 2 Fost. & F. 629-684). In Phelon v. Stiles, 48 Conn. 426, the servant, in delivering bran for his master, left several bags by the roadside, his object being to save unnecessary transportation, and to give him time to attend to some private business of his own; but it was held that he was acting in his master's employment, and that the latter was liable for an injury caused by the fright of a horse caused by the bags of bran. In Hove v. Young, 16 Ind. 812, the plaintiff's complaint averred that his horse was frightened, and his buggy damaged, by the defendant's driving his horse and wagon along the highway in a reckless manner. On demurrer the complaint was held good. Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 624.

The general rule is a very clear one that the master is liable for any act of his servant done within the scope of his employment, and "if a servant is acting in the execution of his master's orders, and by his negligence causes injury to a third party, the master will be responsible, although the servant's act was not necessary for the proper performance of his duty to the master, or was even contrary to his master's orders." Smith, Mast. & S. Blackstone's ed. p. 295, and cases cited. The case of Walton v. New York Cent. Sleeping Car Co. 139 Mass. 556, is cited as supporting the trial court in this nonsuit. That was a case where the porter of a drawing room or parlor car threw a package or bundle, containing soiled clothing and other articles, from the train. Arrangements by the porter had been previously made that some person at the place should pick up and take care of the package for him. The package struck the plaintiff, and injured him. It was held that the act of the porter was not the act of the company, nor in the course of his employment, but for his own convenience. But the distinction between this case and the one at bar is clear. In that case the porter was not operating a car in a dangerous condition, nor a car which he had rendered dangerous by his act, both of which instances would have been in the course of his employment; nor was his act incidental to his employment, but an act for his own convenience solely,—as much so as if he had no connection whatever with the car.

One other ground is urged in support of the nonsuit, and that is that the proof of negligence varies from the averments of the declaration; but it is sufficient to say that the rulings of the trial court excluded any motion for amendment which the plaintiff could have been permitted to make. For these reasons, I shall vote to reverse the judgment of nonsuit.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

Lilly E. ROBBINS

v.

A. S. RASCOE and Wife, Appls.

(120 N. C. 79.)

The delivery of a deed to his natural child by the grantor to the deputy clerk of the court with instructions to have it proved by the subscribing witness before the clerk, who was then absent from the office, and to have it duly registered, is complete and passes title, and cannot be defeated by the grantor's subsequently changing his mind and recalling the deed and destroying it before it had been proved, although the grantee knew nothing of the deed or of its recall.

(Clark, J., dissents.)

(March 9, 1897.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Bertie County in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding to quiet title to real estate. Affirmed.

NOTE.—As to delivery of deed by leaving it for record, see also Lewis v. Watson (Ala.) 22 L. R. A. 297; Lee v. Fletcher (Minn.) 12 L. R. A. 171, and note; 88 L. R. A.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Francis D. Winston for appellants
Messrs. Martin & Peebles for appellee.

Faircloth, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The natural father of the plaintiff executed a deed signed and sealed, conveying property to the plaintiff, and "delivered said deed to the deputy clerk of the superior court of Bertie county, with instructions to have the same proved by the subscribing witness before the clerk of said court, who at the time was absent from his office, and to have the same duly registered;" and some time thereafter, before any probate was had, without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, the grantor took the deed from the deputy clerk, and carried it away from the office, stating that he had changed his mind about the delivery of the same; and after his death his executor destroyed the deed. Plaintiff knew nothing of the deed, or of its recall. The court held that the delivery was complete, and the title passed. Exception and appeal.

also some cases in note to Taylor v. Street (Ga.) 5 L. R. A. 121.

This is the only question in the case, the defendants denying that there had been a delivery.

Upon principle and the authorities we must affirm the judgment. The principle is that when the maker of a deed delivers it to some third party for the grantee, parting with the possession of it, without any condition or any direction to hold it for him, and without in some way reserving the right to repossess it, the delivery is complete, and the title passes at once, although the grantee may be ignorant of the facts and no subsequent act of the grantor or anyone else can defeat the effect of such delivery. In Threadgill, Hough, v. Jennings, 3 Dev. L. 884, it is stated that "a deed is good if delivered to a stranger, to the use of the obligee," and at "the time it was thus delivered." In Tate v. Tate, 1 Dev. & B. Eq. 26, David Tate executed a deed of bargain and sale conveying land to his infant children, and delivered the deed to their uncle, Hugh Tate, in whose possession it remained until his death, when the bargainor went to the widow of Hugh Tate, and obtained the deed before it was registered, and canceled it by tearing off his signature and that of the witness; and he (David Tate) conveyed the same property to another. The delivery of the deed was upheld, the court saying: "When the maker of a deed parts from the possession of it to anybody, there is a presumption that it was delivered as a deed for the benefit of the grantee; and it is for the maker to show that it was on condition, as an escrow. Such a delivery to a third person is good, and the deed presently operates, and infants may assent to such a deed to themselves, and their assent is presumed until the contrary appears,"—citing several English cases. In Kirk v. Turner, 1 Dev. Eq. 14, Henderson, J., says: "A delivery of a deed, is in fact, its tradition from the maker to the person to whom it is made, or to some person for his use; . . . for his acceptance is presumed until the contrary is shown. It being for his interest, the presumption is, not that he will accept, but that he does." In Morrow v. Alexander, 2 Ired. L. 388, a father residing in South Carolina signed and sealed a deed to his daughter, residing in North Carolina, and delivered it in South Carolina to his son, to be given to his daughter. Held by this court that the delivery to his son was complete and the title passed. Gaskill v. King, 12 Ired. L. 211, sustains and cites Tate v. Tate, 1 Dev. & B. Eq. 26. In McLean v. Nelson, 1 Jones, L. 896, the court says: "When one delivers a deed to a third person, in the absence of a grantee, the latter is presumed to accept it; so that it forthwith becomes a deed, and the legal effect is to pass the property. This presumption may, of course, be rebutted by proving that the party refused to accept it; but, until he refuses, his assent is presumed, for the purpose of giving effect to the instrument as a deed. Ut res magis valeat quam pereat." In Phillips v. Houston, 5 Jones, L. 302, the donor signed and sealed the deed, and delivered it to Holland, the witness, "and requested him to take it to the courthouse and have it recorded," which was not done until after the donor's death. It was held that the delivery to the first person (Holland) was perfect, and it made no difference whether it was registered before or after the donor's death, the court saying: "In the case of Hall v. Harris, 3 Ired. Eq. 300, it was said by the court that the delivery of a deed 'depends upon the fact that a paper signed and sealed is put out of the possession of the maker.' That, we think, is the true test, and if it appear that the grantor or donor has parted with the possession of the instrument to the grantee or donee, or to any other person for him, the delivery is complete, and the title of the property granted or given thereby passes. But it will be otherwise if the grantor or donor retain any control over the deed; as if he, when he hands it to a third person, requests him to keep it, and deliver it to the person for whom it is intended, unless he shall call for it again. These principles will be found to govern all the cases, beginning with Tate v. Tate, 1 Dev. & B. Eq. 22,"—and then a large number of North Carolina cases are cited. This principle has governed this court to the present time. Helms v. Austin, 116 N. C. 751; Frank v. Heiner, 117 N. C. 79. The case of Adams v. Adams, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 185, 22 L. ed. 504, is well argued by the court, and the same conclusion arrived at. It is there stated upon the ancient authorities that if A execute a deed to B, and deliver it to C, though he does not say to the use of B, yet it is a good delivery to B if he accepts of it, and it shall be intended that C took the deed for him as his servant; that it is conclusive unless there be clear and decisive proof that he never parted, nor intended to part, with the possession of the deed. There are some decisions in the states holding otherwise, but they are not in harmony with the higher and better authorities. Parmelee v. Simpson, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 81, 18 L. ed. 542, was a controversy between a grantee and a mortgagee, and was decided in conformity to the laws of Nebraska. Hawkes v. Pike, 105 Mass. 560, 7 Am. Rep. 554, is a decision to the contrary, but the annotator of 4 Kent, Com. calls attention to this case as out of line with the better decisions. In Hedge v. Drew, 12 Pick. 141, 22 Am. Dec. 416, the grantor left the deed with the register to be recorded, his daughter being the grantee. The deed was dated October 2, 1823, and was recorded October 3, 1823. An attachment was levied on the same property on October 4, 1823. The court held unanimously that the delivery was equivalent to an actual delivery to the grantee personally. In the case before us, that the grantor intended a delivery, and that the title should pass, at the time he put the deed in the hands of the deputy clerk with instructions to have it probated and registered, is manifest from his statement when he took the deed from the deputy clerk, saying "that he had changed his mind about the delivery of the same, owing to some conduct of the plaintiff that displeased him."

Affirmed.

Clark, J., dissenting:

It is elementary law that a deed is "a written instrument, signed, sealed, and delivered," and that the delivery is as essential as the signing and sealing. There are cases which hold that registration raises a presumption of acceptance by the grantee (1 Devlin, Deeds, § 392, and cases cited), all of which hold that such presumption can be rebutted by evidence. There are cases where a deed is delivered to a party for the benefit of infant children, in which case, as they cannot accept, the law presumes acceptance (Ellington v. Currie, 40 N. C. 21, Gregory v. Walker, 38 Ala. 26); and also cases where a deed has been delivered to a third person, to be registered at the grantor's death, on which event, its recall by the grantor being impossible, a delivery is presumed. But the doctrine of constructive delivery has been extended no further, and there is no case applying it to the facts of the present action, and many to the contrary. Here the deed, which was a deed of gift, was not delivered to the grantee, nor to her agent, nor even to anyone to deliver it to her; it was not accepted by her, nor was its existence then known to her, nor till after its revocation by the grantor. It was not even registered, and hence there is not the presumption of acceptance or delivery. The grantor gave it to a messenger, the deputy clerk, who was to have the clerk probate it, and was then to hand it to the register, who was to record it; but before it got into the hands of the register—indeed, before it was probated—the grantor changed his mind, and took back the deed. Here, certainly, there was no delivery, and no presumption of delivery. In Parmelee v. Simpson, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 81, 18 L. ed. 542, the United States Supreme Court held that, though the deed is delivered to the register and recorded, this is not a delivery if the grantee is ignorant of the existence of the deed, as this rebuts the presumption of acceptance raised by the registration, an acceptance being necessary to constitute delivery. In Derry Bank v. Webster, 44 N. H. 264, 268, it is said: "That the mere sending of the deed to the registry for record is not a delivery, is well settled,"—citing Barnes v. Hatch, 3 N. H. 804; Maynard v. Maynard, 10 Mass. 456, 6 Am. Dec. 146; Samson v. Thornton, 3 Met. 281; Oxnard v. Blake, 45 Me. 602; 4 Kent, Com. 455, 456. Even though the deed was executed, and sent to the register in consequence of a previous agreement that this should be done, if the grantee did not know of its being sent (Jackson, Eames, v. Phipps, 12 Johns. 418), the acceptance is essential to a delivery (Jackson M'Crea, v. Dunlap, 1 Johns. Cas. 114, 1 Am. Dec. 100; Jackson, Ten Eyck, v. Richards, 6 Cow. 617). It is true that the registration raises a presumption of acceptance, and that the subsequent acceptance of a deed registered without the knowledge of the grantee is sufficient (Thayer v. Stark, 6 Cush. 11), unless in the meantime the rights of third persons have accrued, as by an attachment against the grantor, or registration of a deed to another (Harrison v. Phillips Academy, 12 Mass. 461; Jackson, Russell, v. Rowland, 8 Wend. 666); but the assent must be made before the grantor revokes his intention to convey (Canning v. Pinkham, 1 N. H. 357). In Hawkes v. Pike, 105 Mass. 561, 7 Am. Rep. 554, the grantor gave the deed to the register to be recorded, without the grantee's knowledge. The next day the grantor called, the deed being then partially recorded, and asked to recall it. The register refused till he had completed the recording, and then handed the deed back. It was held that no title passed. To same purport, that even a registration of a deed, if without the grantee's assent, is not a delivery, is 1 Devlin, Deeds, § 290, and numerous cases there cited. It must be recalled that here there was no registration, hence no subsequent assent which could turn it into a delivery, and no presumption of delivery. If there had been such presumption, it would have been rebutted by the admission that the grantee had no knowledge of the deed till after its recall. Indeed, the deed was not only not delivered, and not registered, but it did not even get into the hands of the register, and was never in a condition to be registered, since it was recalled by the grantor before it was probated. It was given to a subordinate to hand to the clerk to probate, and then to be carried to the register, but recalled before there was any probate by the clerk, or any delivery to the grantee, or any acceptance, or even knowledge, on her part, or any registration which could have raised even a presumption of delivery. There is no precedent which will make it a valid deed in this absence alike of probate, of delivery, of acceptance, and of registration. This case differs from Phillips v. Houston, 5 Jones, L. 302, and other cases cited in the opinion of the court, in that here the deed was not delivered to anyone to hold for the grantee. It was delivered to the deputy clerk, who was the agent of the grantor, not of the grantee, since his duty was to have it probated for the grantor, and was then to convey it to the register. At no time was it in the hands of anyone for the use of the grantee, or who was directed by the grantor or authorized to deliver it to the grantee. While the execution was still incomplete for lack of delivery to the grantee, or to anyone for her, the grantor revoked what he had done, and refused to perfect the execution, and recalled the inchoate instrument.

v.

J. W. LEARY et al., Appls.

(120 N. C. 90.)

1. A conveyance in fee to a corporation which has a limited existence is not limited to the life of the corporation, and does not give the grantor a resulting trust which will take effect when the corporation ceases to exist.
2. The common law is simply the "right reason of the thing" in matters as to which there is no statutory enactment.
3. A decision which misconceives and wrongly declares the law, whether it is an ancient or a recent one, is subject to be overruled.

(February 16, 1897.)

NOTE.—The above case by overruling an early decision of the same court as based on an unjust rule of the common law probably marks the final disappearance from the courts of that now "obsolete and odious" rule.

As to the right of a corporation to alienate its property, see Chamberlain v. North Eastern R. Co. (S. C.) 25 L. R. A. 139.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Bertie County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Battle & Mordecai for appellants.

Messrs. Francis D. Winston and Shepherd & Busbee for appellees.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs must recover upon the strength of their own title, and not upon defects, if any, in the title of the defendants. The conveyance by their ancestor, Henderson Wilson, was in fee simple to trustees "to convey to Oriental Lodge, No. 24, I. O. O. F., when the same shall have been incorporated by the legislature of North Carolina." It was subsequently incorporated. Though no conveyance by such trustees to the lodge is shown, the learned counsel for the plaintiffs admitted that the statute of uses (27 Hen. VIII.), in force in this state, by virtue of our statute executed the use without the execution of a deed. The grant of the trustee being in fee simple, the cestui que trust took in fee. Holmes v. Holmes, 86 N. C. 205. When the lodge ceased to exist for want of members, whether its property passed to the grand lodge of I. O. O. F. in this state, of which Oriental Lodge No. 24, was a member, or escheated to the state for the university (Code, § 2637), does not concern the plaintiffs, and is not before us. The title in fee simple had passed out of the grantor, and, having vested in the Oriental Lodge, upon the extinction of the latter as a corporate entity, its property by no just construction could return to those whose ancestor had conveyed it in fee upon receipt of the purchase money, which he and they have kept and enjoyed. The plaintiffs' counsel insist, however, that at the time of the conveyance the Revised Statutes (chap. 26, § 17) provided that a corporation, unless otherwise specially stated in its charter, had existence for only thirty years; and, as there was no special provision in his charter, the grantor only parted with the property for thirty years, and held a resulting trust. But the conveyance was in fee, and a corporation limited in duration can take a fee-simple conveyance just as a natural being, whose existence is also limited. Either may convey away the property, and upon the death of either without having disposed of it the property will go to pay creditors, to heirs, to stockholders, or as an escheat, according to the circumstances; but in neither case is there any reverter to the grantors. On the death of a corporation the property is usually administered by a receiver, and on the death of a natural person by the personal representative, or passes to the heirs. By the Constitution of North Carolina (art. 8, § 1) all corporations (if chartered since 1868) are subject to extinction at any time, or their duration can be abridged or extended, at the will of the legislature. It would now be a startling doctrine that upon the repeal of a charter all real estate, though conveyed to the corporation absolutely in fee simple, reverts, as at common law, to the original grantors, to the total exclusion and loss of creditors and stockholders. On the contrary, such property, when not held on a base or qualified fee, as was the case in State v. Rives, 5 Ired. L. 297 (though it has since been held that there are no qualified fees in this state, — School Committee v. Kesler, 67 N. C. 443), would be administered to pay creditors, the surplus being divided among the stockholders. If there were no stockholders, then the question might arise whether the property had escheated to the state; but certainly the grantors, upon such corporation becoming extinct, would have no greater right to a reversion than would the grantors to any other corporation. It is true, it was held in an opinion by Gaston, J., in Fox v. Horah, 1 Ired. Eq. 358, that by the common law, upon the dissolution of a corporation by the expiration of its charter or otherwise, its real property reverted to the grantor, its personal property escheated to the state, and its choses in action became extinct; and hence that, on the expiration of the charter of a bank, a court of equity would enjoin the collection of notes made payable to the bank or its cashier, the debtors being absolved by the dissolution. Judge Thompson (5 Thomp. Corp. § 6720) refers to this decision "in accordance with the barbarous rule of the common law" as "probably the last case of its kind," and notes that it has since been, in effect, overruled in Von Glahn v. De Rosset, 81 N. C. 467, and it is now expressly overruled by us. Chancellor Kent (2 Kent, Com. 307, note), says: "This rule of the common law has, in fact, become obsolete and odious," and elsewhere he stoutly denied that it had ever been the rule of the common law, except as to a restricted class of corporations. 5 Thomp. Corp. § 6730. The subject is thoroughly discussed by Gray on Perpetuities, §§ 44-51, and he demonstrates that my Lord Coke's doctrine rested on the actum of a fifteenth century judge (Mr. Justice Choke, in the Prior of Spaulding's Case [1467] 7 Edw. IV. 10-12), and is contrary to the only case deciding the point (Johnson v. Norwary [1622] Winch, 37), though Coke's statement has often been referred to as law.

But, whatever the extent of this rule at common law, if it was the rule at all it was not founded upon justice and reason, nor could it be approved by experience, and has been repudiated by modern courts. The modern doctrine is, as held by us, that "upon dissolution the title to real property does not revert to the original grantors or their heirs, and the personal property does not escheat to the state." 5 Thomp. Corp. § 6746; Owen v. Smith, 81 Barb. 641; Towar v. Hale, 46 Barb. 361. The crude conceptions of corporations naturally entertained in a feudal and semibarbarous age, when they were few in number, and insignificant in value and functions, by even so able a man as Sir Edward Coke, and the fanciful reason given by him (Co. Litt. 136) for the reverter of their real estate, to wit, that a conveyance to them must necessarily be a qualified or base fee, have long since become outworn and discredited. That which is termed "the common law" is simply the "right reason of the thing" in matters as to which there is no statutory enactment. When it is misconceived, and wrongly declared, the common rule is equally subject to be overruled, whether it is an ancient or recent decision. Upon the facts agreed, judgment should be entered below against the plaintiffs, dismissing their action.

Reversed.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pasquotank County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for causing plaintiff's husband to abandon her. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. F. Aydlett, for appellant:

The plaintiff can maintain her cause of action under either one of the sections of the Code, because her right of action is property, and she can sue for her property under the statute, and under the Constitution of North Carolina.

The right of action, though a tort to the wife, is a chose of action.

Mann v. Marsh, 35 Barb. 63.

Faircloth, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question presented is whether a married woman, being abandoned by her husband, can maintain an action in her own name for a tort. This question has not been heretofore decided by this court. The case is here upon complaint and demurrer, and the allegations of the complaint are at present taken as true. The complaint alleges that the defendant, who is the father of her husband, has, by persuasion and numerous wilful and unlawful acts, caused her husband to wholly abandon and neglect her, to her great damage, etc. The demurrer is grounded on a denial of her right to maintain this action in her own name without the joinder of her husband. The disabilities of married women at common law still exist, as to their person and property, except to the extent of changes by legislation in express terms, or by reasonable construction of the same. These changes tend to relax the common-law rules, and must receive a reasonable construction in the spirit of their enactment. Our Constitution and statutes have made very material and important changes in the status of married women in this state by extending protection to their person and separate property, and allowing them the privilege of free traders, suing in their own names, etc., in certain conditions. Code, § 1832, declares that every woman whose husband shall abandon her "shall be deemed a free trader . . . so far as to be competent to contract and be contracted with," etc.; and this section has been held to be constitutional. Hall v. Walker, 118 N. C. 377. These privileges, as well as those found in Code, § 178, necessarily imply responsibilities and liabilities in certain cases. Finley v. Saunders, 98 N. C. 462, was an action for possession of land against a wife, whose husband had abandoned her, and it was held upon good authorities that the action could be maintained against her alone. Heath v. Morgan, 117 N. C. 508, was an action for personal property unlawfully withheld by the wife, whose husband had abandoned her, and could not be served with process, and it was held that the nonjoinder of the husband was no defense. If a wife then, whose husband has abandoned her, be sued in tort, she may set up a counterclaim for any damages arising out of the same "transaction," disclosed in the complaint; and, if her damages exceed those of the complainant, she is entitled to a judgment for the excess. Code, § 244; Bitting v. Thaxton, 72 N. C. 541; McKinnon v. Morrison, 104 N. C. 354. If, then, she can recover damages by way of counterclaim, which is only her cross action, we fail to see why she cannot do so by direct action. Upon these cases, and upon reason, we think she is entitled to prosecute her claim in this action.

Error.

Furches, J., dissenting:

I do not agree with my brethren. At common law the plaintiff could not have brought and maintained this action. Pippen v. Wesson, 74 N. C. 487. It is admitted in the opinion of the court that the common-law disabilities still exist, unless they have been removed by legislation. Section 1882 of the Code was cited, and is relied on, as making the change that authorized this action. But this section provides that in cases where the wife is abandoned by her husband she "shall be deemed a free trader so far as to be competent to contract and be contracted with and to bind her separate property." To make this section apply, the action must be upon contract, express or implied, or for a tort growing out of contract, or connected with her separate property, or for the recovery of her separate property; and I submit that this action is for neither. Hall v. Walker, 118 N. C. 377, holds that § 1882 of the Code is constitutional and no more. It puts no construction upon this section. Finley v. Saunders, 98 N. C. 462, was an action for land, and Heath v. Morgan, 117 N. C. 508, was an action for personal property, and I submit, have no bearing upon this action. Bitting v. Thaxton, 72 N. C. 541, and McKinnon v. Morrison, 104 N. C. 354, only established the fact that a defendant who is entitled to an action against the plaintiff may set up his right of action by way of counterclaim in those cases provided for by statute. They do not apply in this case, because the plaintiff has no right of action. I am forced to this conclusion by reasoning from common-law principles, and I am sustained in this conclusion by authority. 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law. 834, notes, pp. 8, 9; Van Arnam v. Ayers, 67 Barb. 544; Westlake v. Westlake, 34 Ohio St. 621, 83 Am. Rep. 397.

For these reasons and upon these authorities, I am of opinion the action cannot be maintained.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

NORFOLK STATE BANK, Appt.,

v.

(40 Neb. 735.)

A judgment of a district court in an action commenced prior to the term at which it was rendered, except a judgment

Headnote by NORVAL, Ch. J.

NOTE.—Priority of judgment over conveyances made after beginning of term.

I. English rule.

The rule of the common law was that for some purposes at least a judgment would relate back to the first day of the term at which it was rendered. The precise limits of this rule are rather difficult to ascertain. When it was first formulated judgments were not liens on land, so the question of priority over conveyances made after the beginning of the term could not arise. And about the 38 L. R. A.

by confession, is a lien upon the lands and tenements of the judgment debtor within the county from the first day of the term, no matter on what day of the term it was actually pronounced; and where a mortgage on the real estate of the defendant is executed and recorded during the term, but before the rendition of such judgment, the lien of the judgment is superior to that of the mortgage.

time that land was made subject to the payment of judgments, it was provided by statute that the lien should not relate back so as to prejudice bona fide purchasers. So that the principal effect of the doctrine of relations seems to have been to render valid judgments which were entered after the death of defendant or to prevent one creditor from obtaining priority over others who obtained judgments at the same term. Where there was no reason for the court to consider the question of exceptions it has been stated in the broadest terms that the judgment relates to the first day.

Comyns, Dig. Temp. C, 7, says the term regularly is esteemed as one day, and therefore if a deed be alleged to be enrolled in such term it shall be intended the first day.

In Lord Porchester v. Petrie, 3 Dougl. 261, it is said it is an ancient and fundamental maxim that

(June 5, 1894.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court of Douglas County making a mortgage held by the bank against property belonging to defendant Murphy inferior to the lien of a judgment which had been recovered by Gray against the property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Wigton & Whitham, for appellant:

Section 477 of the Code simply determines judgments are of the first day of the term, and that a fiction shall not be contradicted in order to defeat the ends of that fiction.

The whole term is but one day. And all the judgments are entered as upon the first day of the term. King v. Poynes, 3 Bulst. 114.

If time is for argument on an appeal yet the judgment will be entered as of the first day of the term, the time for argument being merely matter of grace. Egerton v. Morgan, 1 Bulst. 68.

In Duke Norfolk's Case, 7 Mod. 99, it is said that none but a purchaser shall be admitted to say that the judgment was not signed on the first day of the term.

Archbold, Pr. 8d ed. 321, says as far as relates to purchasers bona fide for a valuable consideration a judgment affects the lands, tenements, and hereditaments of the party only from the time it is signed. But as to all other persons not purchasers the judgment as it affects lands relates to the first day of the term at which it is signed.

In Johnson v. Smith, 2 Burr. 967, where the court was considering the question of the antedating of papers, it says the reason why nobody should be permitted to aver that a judgment was signed after the first day of the term is because the fact is not relevant. The rule of law is that they should be made complete and bind to all intents and purposes by relation. But the moment that the law said judgments should bind purchasers only from the signing, it followed that in the case of purchasers the time of signing might be shown.

Relation to assign day.

A judgment shall relate to the first day of the term, viz., the assign day, for in law that is the first day of the term and all legal acts should have relation thereto. Vin. Abr. Judgment, W, subdiv. 6.

In contemplation of law the assign day is the first day of the term. Bolton v. Eyles, 2 Brod. & B. 53.

Though courts do not sit on the assign day it is considered as the first day of the term. Belk v. Broadbent, 3 T. R. 92.

In an action by original the judgment relates to the assign day of the term so as to be good, although the defendant dies after that time and before the judgment is entered. Whittaker v. Whittaker, 8 Barn. & C. 788.

It is said in a note to Walter v. Bould, 1 Bulst. 86, that in an assize between the parties not demandable before quarto die post, the question may be to what day a judgment in full term should have relation, whether to the assign day or to the day in full term, and it was held that the judgment given in full term shall relate to the first day, that is, the assign day. It is further said that it has been the general opinion of the lawyers that a judgment cannot be given upon the assign day, nor yet have relation to the first day, being given in the full term, but this is error; and a case from 22 Edw. IV. is cited to prove that a judgment given in full term relates to the first day, the assign day, "which is the essential day of the term and the other days are but days of grace." And it 88 L. R. A.

the priority of liens of judgment creditors as between themselves; and, to prevent a scrambling among litigants at the same term of court to obtain judgments first, it provides that all judgments rendered during the term in actions begun before the term shall stand on an equal footing, and shall be preferred to judgments rendered in actions begun during the term.

That is, § 477, to clearly express the meaning of the legislature, would read: The lands and tenements belonging at the rendition of the judgment to the debtor and within the county is further said that if there is an appearance the judgment will relate to the first day of the term proper, but if it is a judgment by default it must be to the fourth day before which no default can be recorded.

The assign day was that on which the court was to sit to hear excuses for not appearing to answer to the writs. And it would appear from 1 Bulst. 35, that the writs were made returnable on the first day of the term, and the defendant had grace until quarto die post until which day the judges acquired the habit of not assembling, so that the fourth day was actually the first day of the term on which any business was transacted, while the assign day was the fourth day prior thereto. And this is borne out by 3 Bl. Com. 278. So, in Stamford & Coopers' Case, Herley, 72, it is stated that the first day of the open term was four days after the assign day. And judgment related to the assign day and not to the first day of open term. In a note to 1 W. Bl. 497, it is said that the assign day is in reality the first day of the term but commonly speaking the appearance day or quarto die post is so considered.

Judgment will relate to day prior to death of defendant.

If the judgment is regularly entered in vacation after a term during which the defendant was alive, it will be good although he died before the actual entry of the judgment. Chancy v. Needham, 14 Vin. Abr. Judgment, W, subdiv. 7, p. 617, 2 Strange, 1081.

A judgment on a warrant of attorney entered in vacation will relate to the beginning of the preceding term so as to be good against the assets of the debtor, although he died after the beginning of the term. The statute of frauds which enacts that no judgment shall bind land but from the signing concerns only purchasers and not creditors. Robinson v. Tonge, 3 P. Wms. 397.

A judgment entered in vacation after a term during which the defendant was alive is a good judgment, although he died before entry, because it relates to the beginning of the term. Heapy v. Parris, 6 T. R. 368; Odes v. Woodward, 2 Ld. Raym. 786; Bragner v. Langmead, 7 T. R. 20; Calvert v. Tomlin, 5 Bing. 1; Fann v. Atkinson, Willes, Rep. 427; Kuller v. Jocelyn, 2 Strange, 882; Northern v. Oliver, Barnes, 266; Hall v. Morse, Barnes, 267; Savile v. Wiltshire, Barnes, 270; Fawkes v. Atkinson, Barnes, 268; Fuller v. Jocelyn, 2 Strange, 882.

Bankruptcy claims.

Where a judgment was entered on the 15th of June during a term which commenced on the 7th the plaintiff had a claim which could be proved under bankruptcy proceedings commenced on the 15th. Ex parte Birch, 4 Barn. & C. 880.

A judgment against one who becomes bankrupt after the beginning of the term will relate to the first day of the term so as to be barred by the bankrupt's certificate. The court says at common law all judgments related to the first day of the term in which they were entered up, and that this ruling where the judgment is entered, shall be bound for the satisfaction thereof, as between judgment creditors whose judgments are obtained in actions begun before the term, from the first day of the term at which judgment is rendered; but judgments by confession, etc.

Galway v. Malchow, 7 Neb. 285; Manafield v. Gregory, 11 Neb. 297; Manafield v. Gregory, 8 Neb. 434; Metz v. State Bank, 7 Neb. 165.

The question then occurs, When is a judgment rendered? Evidently not before it is announced by the court.

Horn v. Miller, 20 Neb. 98.

still exists except as it has been modified by statute. Greenway v. Fisher, 7 Barn. & C. 436, 1 Moody & R. 330.

Exceptions.

There seems to have been a well-grounded exception to the rule to the effect that if the judgment was entered upon a later day with the intent that it should not take effect until then, or if for any reason it could not have been entered on the first day, it would not relate to the first day.

A judgment shall have relation to the first day of the term as if it were given on that very day, unless there is a memorandum to the contrary. Dickinson v. Holt, Ch. J., 3 Salk. 212.

In Miller v. Bradley, 8 Mod. 139, it was held that the judgment would relate back to the first day of the term so as to support an execution, but it is said if continuances had been entered no execution could be prior to such entry.

In Bennett v. Isaac, 10 Price, 154, where the question was whether a judgment had been entered in one year or another of a certain King's reign, it is said a judgment of the vacation being considered as referring to the first day of the preceding term is merely a fiction of law, but that fiction must not be suffered to work injustice. The court to prevent its operating injuriously may, and frequently does, inquire of the fact of the actual day on which judgment was entered up. In that case a marginal reference on the record shows the exact day, and the court followed the date so recorded.

In Swann v. Broome, 3 Burr. 1599, the court said that the judgment could not relate to the first day of the term because it could not be given before the return day of the writ of summons which appears by the record to be in the term. But it also said that a judgment relates to the assign day of the term unless something appears on the record to the contrary showing that the judgment cannot have that relation.

In Huys v. Wright, Yelv. 35, where the declaration showed that judgment had been taken after an award requiring the plaintiff therein to release all demands against the defendant, the court held that the award would not be defeated by the relation of the judgment to the beginning of the term, since the declaration particularly alleged in a collateral way that the judgment was after the award and that the court was bound by the allegation, it not having been denied.

In Selwin v. Selwin, 1 W. Bl. 227, where after proceedings had been set on foot for a common recovery the tenant in tail made a will after the beginning of the term at which the recovery was suffered, and also died before such recovery, it was argued that the judgment of recovery should relate to the beginning of the term and therefore take precedence of the will, but it appeared that the return day of the writ was on the third return day of the term which was after the date of the will, and the court thought it could not consider the judgment in the recovery as prior to the return day of the writ.

Where pending the term at which a recovery was had the vouchee died, counsel argued that the recovery should relate to the first day of the term.

The policy of our law is to discourage secret liens, and to require all instruments affecting the title of real estate to be entered of record.

Edminster v. Higgins, 6 Neb. 265.

While the lien is created by the rendition of the judgment, it is not until the judgment is indexed that it affects purchasers.

Hastings School Dist. v. Caldwell, 16 Neb. 73; Morgan v. Sims, 26 Ga. 283; Pope v. Brandon, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 409, 20 Am. Dec. 55.

The law of conveyances of Ohio at the time the cases relied upon by defendants' counsel were determined was quite different from the

The law of conveyances of Ohio at the time the cases relied upon by defendants' counsel were determined was quite different from the Precedence over claims of third persons.

There are a few cases in which the question of relation so as to affect the rights of third persons has been considered, and the judgment has been held to relate back so as to defeat a statute acknowledged during term which was a pledge of the land until the profits should pay the debt.

In Gerrard v. Norris, Latch, 53, where judgment was entered on the 20th day of June and an adverse claim was made under a statute which was acknowledged during the same term on the 2d of June, the reporter says: "I have heard that it was adjudged that the plaintiff had the best right, for he claimed under a judgment, and all the term is in law but one day."

Where the assign day was on the 20th day of the month and a statute was acknowledged on the 22d, and a judgment confessed on the 24d, it was held that the judgment by relation would defeat the statute. Stamford & Cooper's Case, Hotley, 72, sub nom. Standford v. Cooper, Cro. Car. 108, Standford v. Cooper, Hutton, 96.

In Jenk, 250, it is said that if A covenants to levy a fine at Mich. term and acknowledges a statute to a third person on October 8 of the same year, and the fine is levied according to covenant on October 12, the cognizee shall avoid the statute by relation to the assign day which was before the 8th.

II. American comments on English rule.

In Coutts v. Walker, 2 Leigh, 268, the court says there is a dictum of Lord Holt in 3 Salk. 212, repeated by counsel in argument and admitted by the court in Miller v. Bradley, 8 Mod. 190, that the relation does not exist if there is a memorandum to the contrary, as where there is a continuance of the cause to another day of the term. But the occasion or circumstances under which this dictum fell from Lord Holt, or the purpose to which it was applied, is not stated by Salkeld. It is hardly sufficient to overturn the common-law doctrine applied particularly to the lien of judgments, that the whole term is in law one day and that the first day.

A judgment at common law did not bind lands. But courts construed the statute which gives the law of conveyances of this state. A mortgage in Ohio was not executed until it was delivered for record, and until delivered for record was but a mere agreement for a mortgage.

Holliday v. Franklin Bank, 16 Ohio, 587.

And a deed of conveyance of any kind was of no force as a conveyance, even between the parties, until acknowledged before competent authority, thus making the formalities of more importance than the substance. Such is not the law of this state.

Harrison v. McWhirter, 12 Neb. 155.

elegit so as to infer a lien from the power to take the land in execution. Bank of United States v. Winston, 2 Brock, 252.

The rule of the English courts which regarded a term of court as a single day and all judgments rendered during the term as rendered on the first day is never allowed to prevail over the substantial equities of third parties. Powe v. McLeod, 76 Ala. 418.

The Georgia statutes repealed the common-law rule that judgments related to the first day of the term, and the rule of the statute of frauds that lands were bound from the signing of the judgment as to purchasers, and the personal property from the delivery of the execution to the sheriff, although they provided that in case of judgments all rendered at the same term of court should be taken to be of equal date. Johnson v. Mitchell, 17 Ga. 568.

The English doctrine making the whole term one day and making each judgment relate back to the first day of the term is not in force in Missouri. Friar v. Ray, 5 Mo. 510.

In Boyer's Estate, 51 Pa. 432, 91 Am. Dec. 129, it is said at common law the judgment related back to the first day of the term and it required the passage of the act of 1772 to confine its operation to the day on which it was signed in favor of bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration.

In Berry v. Clements, 9 Humph. 812, it is said that whenever the true time of signing the judgment could be ascertained from anything in the record the fiction of relation to the first day of the term was displaced and ceased to operate, and the relation of the judgment in such case was only to the true time of its rendition.

A judgment rendered during term does not relate back to the first day of the term so as to defeat a bona fide purchaser or assignee. The court says the reason of the rule that a judgment operates to restrain control of the debtor over his real estate is founded upon the supposition that the proceedings in a court of record are of public notoriety, and that he who purchases real estate after judgment purchases with notice of its existence. The reason could not extend to give judgments a lien from a period of time anterior to their rendition. The fiction that the whole term of court is considered as but one day is designed to advance, but never to defeat, the purposes of justice. To give retroactive effect to a judgment would be rather subversive than promotive of justice. Pope v. Brandon, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 401, 20 Am. Dec. 49.

Judgment liens are the creatures of positive law without which they cannot exist. Jeffrey v. Moran, 101 U. S. 235, 25 L. ed. 735.

III. States in which the judgment relates back.

There are some states in which the doctrine of relation has been adopted to the full extent, so that the judgment will relate back to the beginning of the term and take priority over a conveyance made between that day and the entry of the judgment.

Under a territorial statute of Arkansas judgments and decrees in chancery related to the first 33 L. R. A.

In the case of Urbana Bank v. Baldwin, 3 Ohio, 65, the court confesses that "the case may be a hard one," yet influenced, doubtless, by their statutes concerning conveyances of real estate, they have made it "a hard one" by their construction of the statute, and have even gone beyond the wording of the statute to give effect to such liens as against innocent and bona fide purchasers without notice, actual or constructive, of any judgment lien.

It is within the power of courts to declare that a thing which is within the letter of a day of the term and created a lien from that time which was superior to the title of a purchaser after the first day of the term but prior to the day the decree was actually made. Keatts v. Fowler, 22 Ark. 483.

In Kansas the judgment is a lien from the first day of the term at which it is rendered. Kiser v. Sawyer, 4 Kan. 508.

A judgment rendered during an adjourned term will relate back to the date of the opening of the original term. Kingsley v. Bagby, 3 Kan. App. 23.

But a judgment of amercement is a lien from its date. Knox v. Merrill, 22 Kan. 572; Lisle v. Cheney, 36 Kan. 573.

Under the Nebraska Code the judgment takes effect as of the first day of the term in all cases begun at a prior term, and therefore will bind land which is conveyed after the beginning of the term at which the judgment is rendered. Kellerman v. Aultman, 30 Fed. Rep. 383.

All judgments rendered during the term in actions commenced prior thereto are liens from the first day of the term. Colt v. DuBois, 7 Neb. 301; Miller v. Finn, 1 Neb. 254.

But the lien attaches only to the actual interest the judgment debtor has in the land when it is rendered. Galway v. Malchow, 7 Neb. 285; Mansfield v. Gregory, 8 Neb. 434; Dewey v. Walton, 31 Neb. 812; Mansfield v. Gregory, 11 Neb. 297.

The rule that a judgment may relate back to the first day of the term so as to be good, although the defendant died prior to its entry, is recognized in Nichols v. Chapman, 9 Wend. 452.

Under the Ohio statutes the judgment relates back to the first day of the term, and will take priority of a mortgage executed before the beginning of the term but not recorded until the first day of the term has expired. Bank of Cleveland v. Sturges, 2 McLean, 341; Doe, Sturges v. Bank of Cleveland, 3 McLean, 140.

Under the Ohio law a judgment is a lien from the first day of the term at which it is rendered. Jeffrey v. Moran, 101 U. S. 235, 25 L. ed. 735; McCormick v. Alexander, 2 Ohio, 65; Urbana Bank v. Baldwin, 3 Ohio, 65; Baird v. Kirtland, 3 Ohio, 23; Towner v. Wells, 3 Ohio, 136; Bish v. Burns, 7 Ohio C. C. 235.

But judgments voluntarily confessed in open court only have a lien on lands from the day on which they are actually signed or entered. McCormick v. Alexander, 2 Ohio, 65.

A judgment entered by confession must be postponed to a subsequent judgment entered during the same term upon regular process. Riddle v. Bryan, 5 Ohio, 48.

But a subsequent statute made judgments by confession relate back to the first day of the term. Jackson v. Luce, 14 Ohio, 514.

To save the lien a levy must be made within a year after the rendition of the judgment. Shue v. Ferguson, 3 Ohio, 136; Waymire v. Staley, 3 Ohio, 366; Sellers v. Corwin, 5 Ohio, 396; Thompson v. Atherton, 6 Ohio, 30; Farmers' Bank v. Commercial Bank, 10 Ohio, 74; Corwin v. Benham, 2 Ohio St. 35.

A mortgage recorded on the first day of the term statute is not governed by the statute, because not within its spirit or the intention of its makers.

Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 511, 143 U. S. 457, 86 L. ed. 326.

Messrs. Wharton & Baird for appellees.

Norval, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 24th day of June, 1890, appellee Fred W. Gray commenced an action in the district of court but before the court actually convenes will prevail over a judgment recovered at the term. Follett v. Hall, 16 Ohio, 111, 47 Am. Dec. 365.

Neglect to issue execution will not defeat the judgment as against a mortgage. Myers v. Hewitt, 16 Ohio, 449.

The lien of the judgment will attach at the time fixed for the opening of court although court does not in fact open until later in the day. Davis v. Messenger, 17 Ohio St. 231; Hemlinway v. Davis, 24 Ohio St. 150.

If after the first judgment is entered a mortgage is given upon the property and then a second judgment is obtained, neglect to issue execution within the proper time will not postpone the first judgment to the other liens because the statute does not apply in case of mortgages and the second judgment is prevented from operating by the intervening mortgage. Brazee v. Lancaster Ohio Bank, 14 Ohio, 318; Holliday v. Franklin Bank, 16 Ohio, 533; Fitch v. Mendenhall, 17 Ohio, 578.

A judgment entered on a day of the term although on a writ issued after the first day will relate to the first day so as to have priority over a deed of trust executed on the second day of the term. Farley v. Lea, 4 Dev. & B. L. 199, 32 Am. Dec. 603; Poust v. Trice, 8 Jones, L. 494; Norwood v. Thorp, 64 N. C. 632; Johnson v. Sedberry, 65 N. C. 5. Although in Den, Bell v. Hill, 1 Hayw. (N. C.) 72, it was held that a judgment bound from the time it was pronounced.

A subsequent statute provided that the lien should be from the time the judgment is docketed. Ross v. Alexander, 65 N. C. 576; Hoppock v. Shober, 49 N. C. 153; Whitehead v. Lettiam, 58 N. C. 232; Holman v. Miller, 108 N. C. 118; Sawyers v. Sawyers, 96 N. C. 324; Williams v. Weaver, 94 N. C. 134; Dewey v. Sugar, 109 N. C. 323, 14 L. R. A. 393; Vanstony v. Thornton, 113 N. C. 196.

But the statute provides that all judgments rendered in any county by the superior court thereof during a term of court, and docketed during the same term or within ten days thereafter, shall be held and deemed to have been rendered and docketed on the first day of the term. Holman v. Miller, 108 N. C. 118.

The judgment may relate back so as to avoid the death of defendant. Miller v. Jones, 2 Speers, L. 315; Mills v. Jones, 2 Rich. L. 398; Dibble v. Taylor, 2 Speers, L. 308, 42 Am. Dec. 363.

As between creditors the judgment will relate to the first day of the term. Porter v. Earthman, 4 Yerg. 358.

In Clements v. Berry, 52 U. S. 11 How. 398, 13 L. ed. 745, it is said that in Tennessee, as against a bona fide purchaser of personal property, the lien of the judgment will not attach prior to the award of execution; but it is said that the judgments entered on the last day of the term by the law of Tennessee have relation to the first day of the term so as to place all the judgments entered at the term on an equality in regard to liens. This is proper to do equal justice to creditors whose judgments are necessarily entered on different days of the term from the arrangement of the cases on the docket; 38 L. R. A.

court of Douglas county against Martin T. Murphy to recover the amount due on a promissory note executed by Murphy. Summons was duly served upon Murphy on June 26, and at the September, 1890, term of said court, to wit, on the 3d day of January, 1891, Gray recovered a judgment in said action against Murphy for $1,285.49, and costs. The September term, 1890, of the district court of the county of Douglas, convened on the 29d of September. After the commencement of said suit, and while the same was pending, on the

and the same is true as regards an assignee for benefit of creditors.

In Virginia the lien of a judgment on lands relates back to the first day of the term. Mutual Assur. Soc. v. Stanard, 4 Munf. 539; Cautts v. Walker, 2 Leigh, 1268; Jones v. Myrick, 8 Gratt. 179; Brockenbrough v. Brockenbrough, 31 Gratt. 580.

The fiction of law which gives a judgment relation to the first day of the term applies to all cases at which the judgment might have been rendered on that day, but not to a case in which it could not have been so rendered. Withers v. Carter, 4 Gratt. 407, 50 Am. Dec. 78; Yates v. Robertson, 80 Va. 476.

The lien of a judgment upon the land of a debtor relates back to the commencement of the term at which the judgment was obtained and overreaches a deed of trust on the land executed by him after the first day of the term. Skipwith v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh, 271, 31 Am. Dec. 642.

Under the Code of 1860, as against a purchaser for value without notice, no judgment operated as a lien upon real estate unless it was docketed within a year from its date. Hill v. Rixey, 26 Gratt. 72.

The Code of 1873 makes a judgment a lien from the time of its rendition. Gurnee v. Johnson, 77 Va. 712; Coldiron v. Asheville Shoe Co., 93 Va. 364.

But in Hockman v. Hockman, 93 Va. 455, it is said that the statute had been construed so that the judgment would relate to the first day of the term even under it. The court says that the statute discloses no intention on the part of the legislature to abrogate the principle of unity of the common law in respect to the day as a point of time. Although confessed judgments are liens from their dates.

IV. General American rule.

The general rule in this country is that the judgment will not relate to the first day of the term. The matter is regulated by statute, and the authorities given here are merely cases in which the statute in force at the time the decisions were rendered was construed. The rule is subject to change at any time, and these authorities are valuable only as showing how the rules have been changed, and as indicating sources of authority for the construction of statutes which may be adopted or changed from time to time. Various words are used in designating the time when the lien will begin. Many of them, however, mean practically the same thing.

Rendition.

Under the Arkansas statutes a judgment was a lien on personally only from the time of issuance of execution. But it was a lien on real estate from the time of its rendition. Baldwin v. Johnston, 8 Ark. 280.

It is a lien on land from its date. Whiting v. Beebe, 12 Ark. 426; Lawson v. Jordan, 19 Ark. 297, 70 Am. Dec. 596; Hersby v. Rogers, 45 Ark. 303.

In Florida the judgment is a lien from the time of its rendition. Moseley v. Doe, Edwards, 2 Fla. 423; Union Bank v. Powell, 3 Fla. 175.

In Illinois the lien commences with the judgment. Rogers v. Dickey, 6 Ill. 636, 41 Am. Dec. 204.

A statute regulating the practice in the courts of 29th day of November, 1890, Murphy and his wife gave to appellant, the Norfolk State Bank, a mortgage upon certain real estate in Douglas county, to secure the payment of a promissory note for $4,676 70, executed by Murphy to cover his overdrafts on the bank. The property described in the mortgage was owned by Murphy prior to the commencement of the term of court at which the judgment aforesaid was rendered. On the 11th day of September, 1891, the Norfolk State Bank brought its action in the court below to foreclose said mortgage, to which the Murphys, Fred W. Gray, and others were made defendants. Gray filed an answer, setting up said judgment, and praying that the same be decreed a lien on the premises included in plaintiff's mortgage prior to the lien of the mortgage. Upon the trial, a decree was entered foreclosing the mortgage, but making the lien thereof junior to the judgment lien of Gray.

The sole question to be decided on this appeal is, Which lien has priority,—the mortgage or judgment? The determination of the question necessitates an examination of § 477 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows:

"Sec. 477. The lands and tenements of the Cook county provided that all judgments should be liens from the time they are entered in the judgment docket. Smith v. Lind, 29 Ill. 24.

Under Revised Laws 1883, a judgment in Illinois did not become a lien until the last day of the term of court at which it was rendered. Riggin v. Muljigan, 9 Ill. 60; Jones v. Guthrie, 23 Ill. 421; Kirk v. Vonberg, 34 Ill. 440; Scammon v. Swartwout, 35 Ill. 823; Wight v. Wallbaum, 39 Ill. 554; McFadden v. Worthington, 45 Ill. 302; Tenney v. Hemenway, 53 Ill. 97; Priest v. Wheelock, 58 Ill. 114.

In Ryhiner v. Frank, 105 Ill. 323, a judgment was given effect from its date as against a subsequent deed of trust on the property, but there is no discussion or explanation of the rule which had previously obtained that the judgment was a lien only from the last day of the term.

But in Dobbins v. First Nat. Bank, 112 Ill. 559, it appears that in 1872 a judgment was made by statute a lien from the time of its rendition.

And all judgments rendered at the same time are entitled to share pro rata. Gay v. Rainey, 39 Ill. 221, 31 Am. Rep. 76.

In Indiana judgments are liens from the time of their rendition. Ridge v. Prather, 1 Blackf. 401; Goodsell v. Stinson, 7 Blackf. 437; Simpson v. Niles, 1 Ind. 196; Fletcher v. Holmes, 25 Ind. 458; Mahoney v. Neff, 124 Ind. 380.

Judgments are liens in the order in which they are rendered. Maxwell v. Vaught, 96 Ind. 136.

The lien of a judgment is subject to all equities which exist against the land in favor of third persons at the time of the rendition of the judgment. Monticello Hydraulic Co. v. Loughry, 72 Ind. 562; Leonard v. Broughton, 120 Ind. 538.

A judgment of the United States court for the district of Indiana is a lien from its date. Barth v. Makeever, 4 Bies. 206.

In Louisiana judgments are liens from the date on which they are recovered except in courts outside of the parish of Orleans where they take effect from the day of the adjournment of the term. Wolf v. Youbert, 45 La. Ann. 1100, 21 L. R. A. 772; Chaffe v. Walker, 39 La. Ann. 35.

In Missouri the lien is from day of rendition. Scott v. Whitehill, 1 Mo. 764; Union Bank v. Marnard, 51 Mo. 548; Cravens v. Rosseter, 116 Mo. 338; Whittlesey v. Brohammer, 31 Mo. 98; Slattery v. Jones, 96 Mo. 216.

In 1853 it was provided that judgments of courts of St. Louis county should not be liens upon real estate until abstracts were filed in the land court, but this statute did not repeal the provision of the Code that there should be no priority between judgments rendered at the same term of court. Dunscomb v. Maddox, 21 Mo. 144.

Entry.

Some of the statutes make the judgment a lien from the time of its entry.

The Supreme Court of the United States has held that in Mississippi the judgment is a lien from the time of its rendition. Brown v. Clarke, 45 U. S. 4 How. 4, 11 L. ed. 880.

And under the Code of 1867 the judgment was a lien from the rendition of it. Clark v. Duke, 59 Miss. 575.

Before that the lien existed from entering of judgment. Biggam v. Merritt, Walk. (Miss.) 430, 12 Am. Dec. 576; Burney v. Boyett, 1 How. (Miss.) 89; Smith v. Ship, 1 How. (Miss.) 234; Smith v. Everly, 4 How. (Miss.) 178; Andrews v. Doe, Wilkes, 6 How. (Miss.) 534; Moody v. Doe, Harper, 25 Miss. 484.

Under the act of 1844 the judgment was a lien from the time of enrolment. Wyatt v. Beatty, 10 Smedes & M. 463; Planters' Bank v. Conger, 12 Smedes & M. 527; Stevens v. Mangum, 27 Miss. 481; Reed v. Haviland, 36 Miss. 323.

Under the Code of 1880 the judgment was a lien from the time of rendition, and should have priority according to the order of enrolment. Scharff Bros. v. Zimmerman, 60 Miss. 793; Hamilton-Brown Shoe Co. v. Walker, 67 Miss. 197.

Under the Delaware statutes the judgment is a lien from the time of its entry. Hollingsworth v. Thompson, 5 Harr. (Del.) 433.

In New Jersey the lien is from time of actual entry. Reeves v. Johnson, 12 N. J. L. 99; McNamara v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 56 N. J. L. 56; Edmunds v. Smith, 52 N. J. Eq. 212.

In Pennsylvania the lien takes effect only from the entry of judgment. Welch v. Murray, 4 Yeates, 197.

Judicial liens have precedence according to the days on which they are entered. Small's Appeal, 24 Pa. 398.

The statute provides that judgments shall bind as against bona fide purchasers from the time they are signed. Emerick v. Garwood, 1 Browne (Pa.) 20, 4 U. S. 4 Dall. 321, note, 1 L. ed. 851.

A judgment is a lien from its entry on the judgment docket. Hohman's Appeal, 127 Pa. 209; Evans v. Evans, 1 Phila. 113.

A judgment entered after the death of defendant cannot relate back so as to have priority over other creditors. Patterson's Appeal, 96 Pa. 93.

In Pennsylvania judgments will take priority according to their dates of entry. Welsh v. Murray, 4 U. S. 4 Dall. 320, 1 L. ed. 850.

In South Carolina a judgment is a lien from the time it is entered up. De Saussure v. Zeigler, 6 S. C. N. S. 12; Adickes v. Lowry, 12 S. C. 97; Woodward v. Woodward, 30 S. C. 259.

In some cases the lien dates from entry on docket.

In California the judgment is a lien from the time it is docketed. Isaac v. Swift, 10 Cal. 71, 70 Am. Dec. 688; Ackley v. Chamberlain, 16 Cal. 181, 76 Am. Dec. 516; People, Bowman, v. Hovious, 17 Cal. 471; Barroilbet v. Hathaway, 81 Cal. 395, 89 Am. Dec. 193; Rogers v. Druffel, 46 Cal. 654; Hibberd v. Smith, 50 Cal. 511; Eby v. Foster, 61 Cal. 228; Menzie v. Watson, 105 Cal. 109.

In Iowa judgments did not operate as liens on real estate prior to 1840. Woods v. Mains, 1 G. Greene, 275.

Then the lien attached at the date of the judgment. Hopping v. Hurnam, 2 G. Greene, 39; Cook v. Dillon, 9 Iowa, 407, 74 Am. Dec. 364; Redfield v.

debtor within the county where the judgment is entered shall be bound for the satisfaction thereof, from the first day of the term at which judgment is rendered; but judgments by confession, and judgments rendered at the same term at which the action is commenced, shall bind such lands only from the day on which such judgments were rendered; all other lands, as well as goods and chattels of the debtor, shall be bound from the time they shall be seized in execution."

The language just quoted is too plain to admit of more than one construction, and that is, all judgments rendered in a district court in actions brought therein prior to the term, except judgments by confession, become liens upon the real estate of the judgment debtor situate within the county from the first day of the term. At common law, all judgments of a court of record relate back to the first day of the term, and are regarded as rendered on that day, no matter on what day of the term they were actually entered. Our statute is declaratory of the rule of the common law, and places all judgments of a district court, except rendered on confession, or in cases in which actions were instituted during the term, upon equality in regard to liens. By Code, § 197, a judgment is not a lien until it is entered in the index of all liens. Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. Heiser, 77 Iowa, 881, 4 L. R. A. 122.

In Taylor v. Thompson, 30 U. S. 5 Pet. 368, 8 L. ed. 134, an English statute applicable to the colonies was held to have been adopted in Maryland so as to create a lien from the time of the rendition of the judgment.

The lien on the lands is from the rendition of the judgment. Hanson v. Barnes, 8 Gill & J. 359, 22 Am. Dec. 822; Miller v. Allison, 8 Gill & J. 35; Mo-Meichen v. Marman, 8 Gill & J. 57.

But judgments rendered at the same term of court but on different days do not relate to the first day of the term and become effective as of that date. They are liens only from the dates at which they are really entered on the docket. And that ruling is put upon the ground that the fiction of relation is excluded by the facts of the record which always contains the date when they were made. The court says that it is the general rule of the common law that all judgments rendered during the term relate back to the first day of the term and are considered as rendered on that day. But it has been entirely abolished as against purchasers by the statute of frauds. Anderson v. Tuck, 23 Md. 221; Coombs v. Jordan, 3 Bland, Ch. 234, 22 Am. Dec. 226.

A later case says a judgment has relation to the time when it is entered up, and will not affect a bona fide conveyance made for value before that time. Dyson v. Simmons, 48 Md. 207.

In Minnesota the lien is from time of docketing. Daniels v. Winslow, 4 Minn. 818; Marshall v. Hart, 4 Minn. 450; Ferguson v. Kumlur, 11 Minn. 104; Dutton v. McReynolds, 81 Minn. 66.

In New York the judgment is a lien from the time of its docketing in the county clerk's office. Crocker v. Lewis, 144 N. Y. 140; Sweet v. Jacobs, 6 Paige, 365, 81 Am. Dec. 252; Brooks v. Wilson, 53 Hun, 178; Wilkinson v. Paddock, 57 Hun, 191.

So in Oregon. Stannis v. Nicholson, 2 Or. 322; Baker v. Woodward, 12 Or. 2.

In Montana the judgment is not a lien until docketed. Skilower v. Abbott, 19 Mont. 228.

In West Virginia there is no lien until the judgment is docketed. Anderson v. Nagie, 12 W. Va. 98.

But as between debtor and creditor judgments are a lien at and after their date, or if they were rendered in court from or after the commencement of the term at which they were rendered. Renick v. Ludington, 14 W. Va. 367.

As between debtor and creditor the statutory provision as to docketing has no application. Graham v. Lucas, 24 W. Va. 231.

Under the Connecticut statutes the judgment is a lien from the time of filing the certificate. Beardsley v. Beecher, 47 Conn. 414.

In Washington the judgment is a lien from the time of filing a transcript. Sawtelle v. Weymouth, 14 Wash. 21.

The United States court held that in Wisconsin a judgment is a lien from the time it is rendered. Milwaukee & M. R. Co. v. James, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 750, 18 L. ed. 854.

But the Wisconsin court held that there is no lien until the transcript is filed. Baltimore Annual Conference v. Schell, 17 Wis. 308.

In Tennessee a judgment binds from the time it is pronounced. Porter v. Cooke, Peck, 30; Hickman v. Murfree, Mart. & Y. 24; Blake v. Heyward, Bail. Eq. 208.

The English rule does not apply in Tennessee, and a judgment there takes effect only from the day it is actually rendered. Murfree v. Carmack, 4 Yerg. 270, 25 Am. Dec. 232.

The judgment is a lien under the act of 1831 from the date of its rendition. Greenway v. Cannon, 3 Humph. 177, 30 Am. Dec. 161; Berry v. Clements, 9 Humph. 512.

No lien exists unless the memorandum is registered in the county where the land is situated. Stahlman v. Watson (Tenn. Ch. App.) 30 S. W. 1055.

In Texas it was a lien from date of rendition. Fisher v. Foote, 25 Tex. Supp. 811; Blankenship v. Douglas, 28 Tex. 225, 82 Am. Dec. 606; Grace v. Wade, 45 Tex. 323; Frazier v. Thatcher, 49 Tex. 26.

But under the Revised Statutes the judgment is a lien from the time it is recorded. Belbase v. Ratto, 66 Tex. 636; Kennard v. Mabry, 78 Tex. 151.

Under the Revised Statutes the judgment does not operate as a lien until the index to the record is alphabetical, showing the names of each plaintiff and defendant. Steffens v. Cameron (Tex.) 19 S. W. 1068.

Execution necessary.

In Alabama a judgment originally bound land from the time of its rendition, and had no relation to the first day of the term. Quinn v. Wiswall, 7 Ala. 645; Forrest v. Camp, 16 Ala. 642; Morris v. Elia, 8 Ala. 562.

Judgments take effect from the day on which they are rendered. Ex parte Dillard, 68 Ala. 594.

Under the Alabama system a term of court is not regarded as one day. Alabama Coal & Nav. Co. v. State, Hamilton, 54 Ala. 38.

Under the later Alabama statutes judgments do not constitute liens. But execution must be issued to have that effect. Gamble v. Fowler, 58 Ala. 576.

In Alabama a judgment in itself imposes no lien upon the property of a judgment debtor, but the issuance of an execution and its delivery to an officer are necessary for that purpose. Beebe v. United States, 161 U. S. 104, 40 L. ed. 633.

ment of Gray has relation to the first day of the term at which the same was recovered, and was a lien upon the lands owned by Murphy within the county from the first day of such term. The same construction was placed upon the statute in Miller v. Finn, 1 Neb. 254, and was followed in the case of Colt v. Du Bois, 7 Neb. 891.

It is insisted by counsel for plaintiff in error that the section quoted merely determines the priority of liens of judgment creditors as between themselves; and, further, that the lien of a mortgage duly recorded during a term of court, and before the entry of a judgment at that term, is paramount to the lien of the judgment. We are unable to so construe the statute. It, in express terms, declares that "the lands and tenements of the debtor within the county where the judgment is entered shall be bound for the satisfaction thereof from the first day of the term at which judgment is rendered." Plain language could not have been selected. The lien of a judgment does not attach merely to the debtor's interest in land when the judgment is obtained, but to whatever interest therein he possessed on the first day of the term at which the same was entered. To hold otherwise would be to make the law, and not simply to apply the same.

A judgment being a lien upon real estate from the first day of the term, such lien is superior to the lien of a mortgage subsequently given by the debtor. To adopt the construction contended for by counsel would be injecting words into the statute by judicial interpretation, which we have no power to do. Had the legislature intended that the doctrine of relation as to lien of judgments should not apply where a mortgage is recorded before the judgment is actually entered, it would have used apt words indicative of such purpose. Our conclusion is that the lien of the mortgage is junior to that of the judgment. The construction we have given the section does not conflict with the prior decisions of this court cited in the brief of counsel, as a cursory examination

Under the Alabama statutes a judgment is not a lien, but the lien is acquired by the issuance of execution. Perkins v. Brierfield Iron & Coal Co. 77 Ala. 408; Carlisle v. Godwin, 68 Ala. 137.

Under the act of 1889, however, the judgment becomes a lien when it is registered in the office of the county probate judge. German Security Bank v. Campbell, 99 Ala. 249.

From last day of term.

In New Hampshire the intentment is that the judgment was entered on the last day of the term unless the record shows it to have been entered on a different day. New Hampshire Strafford Bank v. Cornell, 2 N. H. 324.

The decree of the probate court is considered as made and entered as of the last day of the term unless a minute be made in the record indicating an earlier day. Goodall v. Harris, 20 N. H. 363.

In Massachusetts judgments are presumed to be entered on the last day of the term unless they are in fact entered previously. Herring v. Polley, 8 Mass. 119.

A judgment is considered as rendered on the last day of the term. Bradish v. State, 35 Vt. 452; Hoar v. Commissioners of Jail Delivery, 3 Vt. 403; Day v. Lamh, 7 Vt. 426.

Later it is said that judgments take effect from the time they are rendered, and not from the time they are recorded. Huntington v. Charlotte, 15 Vt. 44.

V. Judgment with stay of execution.

A judgment with a stay of execution creates no lien until the right to issue the execution accrues. Bank of United States v. Winston, 2 Brock. 252; Soriba v. Deane, 1 Brock. 170.

But in Mississippi judgments rendered with a stay of execution given under the law of 1824 were liens from the date of rendition. Pickett v. Doe, Planters' Bank, 5 Smedes & M. 470, 43 Am. Dec. 523.

VI. Special cases.

There are several cases in which the judgment is made to relate, not only to the first day of the term, but even to the commencement of the proceedings. This class of cases is not within the scope of this note, and a full collection of the cases is not made here, but only enough are cited to illustrate the rule.

In Jones v. Jones, 1 Bland, Ch. 443, 18 Am. Dec. 227, it is said that in claims in favor of the King the 38 L. R. A.

lien existed, not only from the date of the judgment, but from the commencement of the suit, to the exclusion of all subsequent encumbrances.

A statute providing that a judgment affecting real estate shall only be a lien from the time it is actually docketed has no reference to a judgment of foreclosure of a mortgage. Huntington v. Meyer, 22 Wis. 557.

A judgment and sale in foreclosure of a mortgage will relate to the date of the mortgage. Robinson v. Thornton, 102 Cal. 675; Miller v. Fluck, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. 585.

A judgment of foreclosure may, as between the parties, relate back to the date of the mortgage. Christy v. Dyer, 14 Iowa. 433, 31 Am. Dec. 498; State, School Fund, v. Lake, 17 Iowa. 215.

In Illinois the statute establishes a lien against the property of a convict from the time of his arrest or indictment. Hitchcock v. Roney, 17 Ill. 231.

The Indiana statute provides that judgments on bonds shall bind the real estate of the debtor from the commencement of the action. Shane v. Francis, 30 Ind. 92; Day v. Worland, 38 Ind. 75; Flemer v. Taggart, 116 Ind. 189; Leonard v. Broughton, 120 Ind. 536.

Judgments in special actions against officers may be made to take effect from the time the action is commenced. Hoge v. Brookover, 28 W. Va. 304.

The Georgia statutes provide for a retroactive judgment in divorce proceedings where special property is scheduled in the pleadings and a prayer made that it be made subject to payment of alimony. Coulter v. Lumpkin, 94 Ga. 225.

A South Carolina statute provides that when an action against a railroad company for damages for personal injuries shall be prosecuted to judgment the lien of the judgment shall relate back to the time the injury occurred. Central Trust Co. v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. 65 Fed. Rep. 257.

The doctrine of relation of judgments is entirely distinct from that of lis pendens, which is discussed in Chautauque County Bank v. Risley, 19 N. Y. 399, 75 Am. Dec. 347; and Lincoln Rapid Transit Co. v. Rundle, 34 Neb. 559.

Under that doctrine a purchaser may be postponed to a judgment, but it is because the statute forbids him to meddle with the property pending the suit, and not because the judgment relates to the first day of the term. The doctrine of lis pendens is obviously not within the scope of this note. The question discussed in GORTZINGER v. ROSENFIELD as to division of a day will be reserved for a future note.

H. P. F.

of the cases will disclose. In Galway v. Malchow, 7 Neb. 285, certain judgments were recovered against Malchow after the recording of a mortgage given by him to the plaintiffs. By mistake, the land intended to be included in the mortgage was described as being in section 28, instead of section 33. It was held that the lien of the judgments was subject to the equity of the mortgage. The proposition we have been discussing was not involved nor passed on in that case. That decision simply affirms the doctrine that a judgment upon real estate is subject to all prior equities existing against the debtor at the time of its becoming a lien. This court did not undertake to decide at what date the lien of a judgment attaches to the lands of the defendant. The rule stated in Galway v. Malchow has been reaffirmed and applied in Metz v. State Bank, 7 Neb. 165; Manfield v. Gregory, 8 Neb. 434, 11 Neb. 297; Leonard v. White Cloud Ferry Co. 11 Neb. 333; Dewey v. Walton, 31 Neb. 819.

It is unnecessary to point out the difference between the facts upon which they are decided and those in the case we are considering. It is sufficient to say that in none of the cases mentioned was § 477 of the Code before the court for consideration, nor was the question raised by this record discussed therein. Under the above authorities, a judgment lien is subject to all prior liens on the land of the defendant; but this principle does not militate against the construction we have given § 477. Had plaintiff's mortgage been made before the term of court at which Gray's judgment was entered, although recorded subsequent thereto, the cases would have some bearing here. But it was not so made; hence the judgment lien antedates the mortgage. The effect of the decisions of this court is that a creditor acquires no better right to his debtor's property than the latter himself has. The lien of a judgment is subordinate to all equities which existed in favor of third parties when the lien of the judgment attaches; in other words the lien of a judgment is limited to the actual interest the debtor has in the property. Another decision of this court relied on by the appellant is Horn v. Miller, 20 Neb. 96. It was there ruled that the time within which to perfect an appeal taken from a decree of the district court begins to run from the date on which the court formally announces its conclusion and judgment, and not from the date on which the clerk enters the same on the court journal. Horn v. Miller was expressly overruled in Bickel v. Dutcher, 35 Neb. 761, it being there decided that the time within which an appeal may be taken does not commence running until the decree is entered of record. For the purposes of an appeal, the date of a judgment is deemed to be the time it is actually spread upon the records, but that is no reason for holding that the lien of a judgment does not attach until that time. The language of the section relating to the time for perfecting appeals is quite different from the provision on the subject of judgment liens. For the purpose of an appeal, the date of a judgment is regarded as having been rendered at one time; while, for the purpose of binding the lands of the debtor by legal fiction, it is considered as having been entered at a date often anterior to the time it was pronounced by the court. The decisions of this court to the effect that a judgment does not become a lien upon the lands of the defendant, as against a subsequent purchaser, without notice, until properly indexed, have no application to the case at bar, since plaintiff is not such a purchaser. It is not even a good-faith mortgagee. The bank did not extend credit to Murphy on the strength that the land was free from liens, but the mortgage was given to secure a prior indebtedness of the mortgagor. When the security was taken, the officers of the bank knew, or ought to have known, that the records of the district court of Douglas county disclosed that the action was pending against Murphy, and that a judgment might be recovered therein during the term which would be a lien on the land.

We are unable to perceive that the statute relating to lis pendens (§ 85 of the Code) has any bearing upon the question under consideration, since, in actions at law to recover money judgments merely, no notice of their pendency is required to be given to third parties. It is only in a suit brought to affect the title to real property that the statute requires that notice of lis pendens shall be given. The pendency of an action to recover a money judgment is of itself notice to anyone purchasing the lands of the defendant during a term of court that, before the close of the term, the plaintiff may recover a judgment therein which will be a lien upon said real estate. We know that text writers state the general rule to be that judgments do not relate back to the first day of the term, so as to create a lien on the real estate of the defendant anterior to their rendition; and such is the trend of decisions of the courts in most of the states. But it should be remembered that all the states, excepting a few, have statutes which, in express terms, provide that judgments shall become liens upon the lands of the debtor, either from the date on which they are rendered or the last day of the term. 1 Black, Judgm. § 443. Such, however, is not the common-law rule, nor is it the doctrine in states having statutes similar to our own. Mr. Black, in his treatise on Judgments, at § 441, observes that "it was the rule of the common law (and this rule still obtains in some of the states) that the judgments of a court of record all relate back to the first day of the term and are considered as rendered on that day; and therefore their lien will attach to the debtor's realty from the beginning of the term, and will override a conveyance or mortgage made on the second or any succeeding day, although actually prior to the rendition of the judgment." There, the same author, in the next section, says that, "as against intervening purchasers, it may be regarded as settled that the lien of a subsequent judgment will not attach, justice forbidding that in such a case it should relate back to a time anterior to the conveyance."—citing Morgan v. Sims, 26 Ga. 283; Pope v. Brandon, 3 Stew. (Ala.) 401, 20 Am. Dec. 49. The same doctrine is stated in a note on page 115, 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, and the following, in addition to the Georgia case above referred to, are cited in support thereof: Skipwith v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh, 272, 81 Am. Dec. 642; Withers v. Carter, 4 Gratt. 407, 50 Am. Dec. 78; Brockenbrough v. Brockenbrough, 31 Gratt. 580.

An examination of the foregoing authorities will disclose that all but one fall far short of sustaining the principle they are cited to support. In Withers v. Carter, 4 Gratt. 407, 50 Am. Dec. 78, a judgment and a decree were rendered at the same term of court, the former eleven days before the latter. The question was whether they were both of equal priority. The court held that the lien of the judgment was superior to that of the decree, inasmuch as the case in which the decree was obtained was not in such a situation as to entitle plaintiff to a final adjudication on the first day of the term. We quote the following from the syllabus of the case: "The fiction of law which gives a judgment relation to the first day of the term applies to all cases in which the judgment might have been rendered on that day, but not to a case in which it could not have been rendered." The above case was cited with approval and followed in Yates v. Robertson, 80 Va. 475, Skipwith v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh, 271, 81 Am. Dec. 642, was this: At the October term, 1827, of the superior court of Petersburg, to wit, on the 17th day of October, Humbertson Skipwith, executor, recovered a judgment against one Richard M. Cunningham for $4,187.88. The October term should have commenced on the 15th day of October, but, owing to the failure of the judge to attend sooner, the court did not actually convene until three days later. On the 18th day of October, 1827, Cunningham executed a deed of trust upon his real estate to secure certain creditors, which deed was recorded on October 15. The court adhered to the doctrine laid down in the former decisions in Mutual Assur. Soc. v. Stanard, 4 Munf. 539, and Coutts v. Walker, 2 Leigh, 268, to the effect that a lien of a judgment relates back to the commencement of a term at which it was recovered, and has priority over a deed of trust on the land of the defendant, executed on or after the first day of the term. The court also held that the day on which the court actually commences its session, and not the day appointed by law for the beginning of the term, should be regarded as the first day of the term. The court, in the syllabus, says: "It is well settled, as a general rule, that the lien of a judgment upon the land of the debtor relates back to the commencement of the term at which the judgment was obtained, and overreaches a deed of trust on the land executed by the debtor on or after the first day of the term. But the term is not considered as necessarily commencing on the day appointed by law for its commencement. A deed admitted to record on the day appointed for commencing the term, but before the day on which the court actually commences its session, will be unaffected by the lien of the judgment." In Brockenbrough v. Brockenbrough, 31 Gratt. 580, the question arose as to which of the two judgments was the prior lien, both being rendered at the same term of court,—one on the first day thereof, and the other on the last day. The court held that both judgments related back to the first day of the term, and that there was no priority between them. Burks, J., observed: "It is further contended that if the judgment is not void, the appellant's judgment has priority as a lien. The latter was a judgment by default in a pending suit, and has relation to the first day of the term of the court in which it was rendered. The judgment of Settle was confessed in the same court and on the first day of the same term. Both must be treated as judgments rendered on the same day, at the same time. Neither has precedence over the other in point of time. In such case the court takes no notice of the fractions of a day," citing Coutts v. Walker, 2 Leigh, 268; Skipwith v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh, 271, 81 Am. Dec. 642; Withers v. Carter, 4 Gratt. 407, 50 Am. Dec. 78; Freem. Judgm., §§ 369, 370. Morgan v. Sims, 26 Ga. 283, was based upon a statute entirely different from § 477 of the Code of this state. In Georgia the statute relating to the liens of judgments provides that the property of the defendant "shall be bound from the signing of the first judgment; but where several judgments shall be of equal date, the first execution delivered to the sheriff shall be first satisfied." Cobb's Analysis & Forms, 89. Under such a provision the court very properly held that the judgment was a lien from the time of the signing thereof, and that the doctrine of relation did not apply. In the Alabama case (Pope v. Brandon) 2 Stew. (Ala.) 407, 20 Am. Dec. 49) the doctrine contended for by appellant herein was held and applied. Other cases may be found which are in line with Pope v. Brandon, but they are almost wholly influenced by local statutes. The following authorities sustain the construction we have given § 477 of the Code: Urbana Bank v. Baldwin, 8 Ohio, 65; Jackson v. Lucie, 14 Ohio, 514; Davis v. Messenger, 17 Ohio St. 231; Doe, Sturges, v. Bank of Cleveland, 8 McLean, 140; Mutual Assur. Soc. v. Stanard, 4 Munf. 539; Coutts v. Walker, 2 Leigh, 268; Horsley v. Garth, 2 Gratt. 471, 44 Am. Dec. 393; Kellerman v. Aultman, 80 Fed. Rep. 888; Farley v. Lea, 4 Dev. & B. L. 169, 32 Am. Dec. 680; Norwood v. Thorp, 64 N. C. 682; Porter v. Earthman, 4 Yerg. 358.

The case of Urbana Bank v. Baldwin, 8 Ohio, 65, was this: Josiah Baldwin conveyed to C. and E. B. Caville certain real estate in Clark county, the deed bearing date November 21, 1820. The November term, 1820, of the court of common pleas of that county commenced on the 20th day of that month, and on the same day the Urbana Bank commenced a suit against Baldwin and others. After service of summons, and on the 25th day of the same month, judgment was rendered against the defendants, served upon confession. Subsequently, on September 4, 1826, the real estate conveyed to the Cavillers was levied upon to satisfy the judgment. A motion was made by the purchasers under Baldwin to set aside the levy. The supreme court held that the judgment was a lien upon the land, although it had been sold by the judgment debtor four days prior to the rendition of the judgment, but subsequent to the commencement of the term of court. In Jackson v. Lucie, 14 Ohio, 514, the facts were these: At the April term, 1842, of the court of common pleas of Ashtabula county, which commenced on the 10th day of the month, plaintiff recovered a judgment against the defendants for $1,474.37. The judgment was obtained by confession on April 10. On April 7 the defendants executed a mortgage to one Eastman upon certain real estate in the county, to secure the sum of $2,300, which mortgage was filed for recording on April 12. In an action brought to settle the priorities of the lien of the judgment and mortgage the court held that the judgment operated as a lien upon the land from the first day of the term, and was superior to the lien of the mortgage. Bank of Cleveland v. Sturges, 2 McLean, 841, arose in Ohio. It was a contest between a mortgagee of real estate and a judgment creditor of the mortgagor. The judgment was recovered the second day of the term of court, and the mortgage was recorded the same day. It was ruled that, under the statute of Ohio, the lien of the judgment was paramount, since it took effect on the first day of the term. To the same effect is Doc. Sturges, v. Bank of Cleveland, 3 McLean, 140.

It is urged that the two Ohio cases referred to and the decisions reported in 2 and 3 McLean, were decided under a statute materially different from the one relating to the liens of judgments in this state. The statute in force in Ohio when said cases arose declares "that the lands and tenements of the debtor shall be bound for the satisfaction of any judgment against such debtor from the first day of the term at which judgments shall be rendered in all cases where such lands lie within the county where the judgment is entered, and all other lands, as well as the goods and chattels of the debtor, shall be bound from the time they are seized in execution." Ohio Laws 1824, p. 108; Swan's (Ohio) Stat. 1841, p. 468; 3 Chase's Stat. p. 1709.

The only difference between the foregoing provision and our § 477 is this: Under the Ohio statute all judgments, whether by confession or not, become liens from the first day of the term at which they are entered; while, under ours, judgments by confession and judgments rendered at the same term at which the actions are commenced become liens from date of rendition. All other judgments in this state relate back to the first day of the term, and are liens from that date. It requires no argument to show that the Ohio decisions to which reference has been made are entitled to great weight in construing our statute. In fact, the statutory provisions of the two states being so nearly alike, and ours having been adopted in 1858, after the highest court of Ohio had construed the section above quoted, the precedents are almost, if not quite, conclusive upon the question under consideration. Our § 477 is precisely the same as § 421 of the present Code of Ohio, which was enacted in that state in 1858. Swan's Stat. 1864, p. 675. After the legislature of Ohio had adopted the statute relating to liens of judgments, of which ours is a literal copy, the supreme court of that state, in 1867, in Davis v. Messenger, 17 Ohio St. 231, held that a judgment operates as a lien upon the lands of the defendant from the first day of the term, and is superior to a mortgage recorded during the same term, although prior to the date of the judgment. In that case the plaintiff recovered a judgment against Joseph Johnston in the court of common pleas of Union county at the May term, 1859, of said court, which began at 12 o'clock noon on the 9th day of said month. The judges of said court, under and in pursuance of the statute of that state, issued an order specifying that the term would commence at 10 o'clock on said day, which order was spread upon the journal of the court, as required by said law. Johnston executed a mortgage to the defendant Messenger on 120 acres of land situated in said county, and owned by Johnston, which mortgage was delivered for record on the 9th day of May, 1859, at 11 o'clock A. M. The trial court held that the lien of the judgment did not attach until the court actually commenced, and that the lien of the judgment was junior to that of the mortgage. On error to the supreme court, the judgment was reversed, the court holding that the judgment lien had priority over that of the mortgage. This case is precisely in point.

A construction has been placed on § 477 of the Code in Kellerman v. Aulman, 30 Fed. Rep. 888, which arose in the circuit court of the United States for this district. On the 4th day of February, 1883, the defendants recovered a judgment against one Van Slyke in a suit commenced in October, 1882. The judgment was rendered at the January term, 1883, the term commencing on the 1st Monday in January. On January 17, 1883, but prior to the entry of the judgment, Van Slyke conveyed the lands in controversy, which he had owned for several years, to the plaintiff's grantor. Execution was issued and levied upon said lands under said judgment, and plaintiff brought an action to restrain the sale thereunder. Judge Brewer, after citing § 477 of the Code, held that the judgment was a lien from the first day of the term, and took priority in date over the conveyance.

We have been unable to find, although we have made diligent search, a single decision under a statutory provision similar to the Nebraska statutes which sustains the contention of counsel for appellant. We do not think that the district court erred in giving the judgment priority over the mortgage.

The decree is affirmed.

Irvine, C., having presided in the court below, took no part in the above decision.

Ryan, C., dissenting:

The case at bar presents the question of priority as between the lien of a judgment rendered in a case continued from a former term, as against the rights of a mortgagee under a mortgage taken and recorded prior to the rendition of the judgment, but during the same term. The writer hereof conceives that there is a difference in priority between mere liens upon real property, both of them having their origin during the same session of court, and the lien of a judgment rendered during a term, but subsequent to a conveyance by deed of the property attempted to be charged with the lien of a judgment. In the latter case it would seem that, at the time of the rendition of the judgment, the defendant is possessed of no interest in the real property upon which a general judgment could be operative, hence the difference in the principles above stated. Section 477 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "the lands and tenements of the debtor within the county where the judgment is entered shall be bound for the satisfaction thereof from the first day of the term at which judgment is rendered," etc. There are other classes of cases included within the provision of this section, but the language quoted is all that is applicable to the matter under consideration. It is contended that the term "the lands and tenements of the debtor" refers to the first day of the term at which judgment is rendered, and that therefore this provision should be construed as though it read: "The lands and tenements of the debtor which he owned on the first day of the term shall be bound for the satisfaction of a judgment rendered, no matter at what time during that term." In passing, it may be observed that the literal construction contended for would exclude any lands or tenements of the debtor acquired subsequently to the first day mentioned,—a conclusion which has been repudiated by this court. It seems to the writer hereof that a more natural and reasonable construction would be that which would cause a paraphrase of the language to read as follows: "The lands and tenements of the debtor owned by him when the judgment is rendered shall be bound for the satisfaction thereof from the first day of the term at which such judgment is rendered." Any other construction renders the judgment lien operative against lands not owned by the debtor when the judgment is entered,—a construction which seems incompatible with several of the decisions of this court. In Colt v. DuBois, 7 Neb., on page 894, is found the following language of Judge Gant, referring to the lien of a judgment upon real property acquired after the rendition of a judgment: "The lien is neither a jus in re nor jus ad rem, and amounts only to a security against subsequent purchasers and encumbrancers. 4 Kent, Com. 437. It confers only the right to levy on the land to the exclusion of other adverse interests subsequent to the rendition of the judgment, and this right applies to all the lands and tenements of the debtor in the county where the judgment is entered, whether held by him at the time of the rendition or subsequently acquired." In Galwey v. Matchow, 7 Neb. 285, the subject under discussion was whether or not the lien of a judgment should be declared paramount to the lien of a mortgage as against lands which the mortgage, by reason of a mistake, failed properly to describe; and it was held that the judgment was within the class of cases against which the mortgage had become effective irrespective of the record thereof as provided by § 16, chap. 48, Rev. Stat. Judge Lake, discussing the lien of the judgment in this case, said: "And this lien is a legal one, and does not exceed the actual interest which the judgment debtor had in the estate at the time the judgment was rendered." Pierce v. Brown, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 205, 19 L. ed. 134. It is well settled that a judgment lien on the land of the debtor is subject to every equity which existed against the debtor at the rendition of the judgment; and courts of equity will always limit the lien to the actual interest of the judgment debtor.

Freem. Judgm. § 857, and cases cited: Swartz v. Stees, 2 Kan. 286." In Berkley v. Lamb, 8 Neb., on page 399, will be found the following language of Maxwell, Ch. J., to wit: "In the case of Colt v. DuBois, 7 Neb. 891, it was held that the lien of a judgment attaches to all the lands and tenements of the debtor in the county where the judgment is rendered, whether held by him at the time of its rendition or subsequently acquired. We adhere to that decision, but the lien of the judgment attaches only to the interest of the debtor in the land." Pilley v. Duncan, 1 Neb. 145, 93 Am. Dec. 887; Uhl v. May, 5 Neb. 157; Galwey v. Matchow, 7 Neb. 285. And the lien can attach to no greater interest than that owned by the debtor." Cobb, J., approved of the line of argument of the chief justice, and the dissent of Lake, J., is mentioned at the end of the above opinion, but there is given no statement of the grounds of that dissent, though, in view of his language in Galwey v. Matchow, quoted above, it could hardly have applied to the portion of the opinion of the chief justice just quoted. This inference finds countenance in the following language in the opinion filed by Lake, J., in Mansfield v. Gregory, 11 Neb., on page 298: "The lien of an ordinary judgment on the real estate of the debtor is not specific, but general, and is subject to all prior liens, either legal or equitable." Metz v. State Bank, 7 Neb. 165. Such lien does not exceed the actual interest of the judgment debtor in the land, and is subject to every equity therein existing against the debtor at the time of its rendition. Galwey v. Matchow, Id. 285."

In Leonard v. White Cloud Ferry Co. 11 Neb. 888, and in Dewey v. Walton, 31 Neb. 819, this court again reiterated and enforced the rule that the lien of a judgment could attach to no greater interest in the land than the defendant possessed; citing the authorities above referred to and quoted from. This may therefore be accepted without question as fully settled in this state, and it therefore becomes important to consider what interest a defendant retains in real property after his conveyance thereof. Section 50, chap. 73, Comp. Stat., provides that "every conveyance of real estate shall pass all the interest of the grantor therein, unless a contrary intent can be reasonably inferred from the terms used." In Edminster v. Higgins, 6 Neb. 265, this court had under consideration the right of a vendor to a vendor's lien upon real property for its purchase price; and Maxwell, J., in the opinion filed, used the following language, immediately following § 50, supra, which he had just quoted: "The obvious intention of the registry acts is to give notice to all persons who may have occasion to ascertain whether there has been any prior encumbrance or conveyance of any real estate. And the notice given by the record is as effectual in law as personal notice to the party to be affected by it. The policy of our law is to discourage secret liens, and to require all instruments affecting the title to real estate to be entered of record. The law thus places the means within the reach of everyone desiring to purchase real estate of ascertaining the conditions of its title." The opinion just referred to contains the following language, almost at its close: "We are clearly of opinion that the doctrine of a vendor's lien in a case like the one at bar is repugnant to our statutes in relation to real estate, and is therefore no part of our law." It is difficult to imagine why these considerations are not applicable to the lien of a judgment obtained after the first day of the term at which it was rendered, as affecting a conveyance meantime made by the defendant. It may be claimed, however, that the pendency of the action constructively affects with notice of the result all parties who contemplate purchasing real property of the defendant. The law governing lis pendens is found in § 85 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It provides that, "when a summons has been served or publication made, the action is pending so as to charge third persons with notice of pendency, and while pending no interest can be acquired by third persons in the subject-matter thereof as against the plaintiff's title." This language is followed by a long proviso, probably intended to require the filing in the office of the county clerk or register of deeds of a notice defining the object of the action, its subject matter, etc. As this proviso was intended as a limitation most likely, though as to its effect there is no great certainty, the party above quoted is that upon which alone, if at all, a judgment lien in the case supposed can be made effective as against the purchaser of real estate. It cannot escape observation that, by the provisions of § 85, notice is implied to third parties of the pendency of the action, and that, while the action is pending, third persons can acquire no interest in such subject matter as against the plaintiff's title. As has already been noted, it was stated in Cole v. DuBois, 7 Neb. 394, by Judge Gantt, in delivering the opinion of this court, that a judgment lien is neither a jus in re nor a jus ad rem, and amounts only to a security against subsequent purchasers and encumbrancers. The language of § 85 implies that notice lis pendens is restricted entirely to the plaintiff's title to the subject-matter in dispute, and therefore could operate only where the subject-matter litigated is a jus in re or a jus ad rem. The case of Lincoln Rapid Transit Co. v. Rundle, 34 Neb. 559, quotes from text-writers of approved authority, illustrating the origin, necessity, and application of the rule of lis pendens, laid down in § 85 of the Code of Civil Procedure, harmoniously with the views just expressed. The conclusion is irresistible that the pendency of a suit which finally culminates in a judgment during the term is not notice that such a lien may arise incidentally thereto as against a conveyance meantime made, for the very good and sufficient reason that it is not justified by the terms of § 85, just referred to. If a purchaser is not bound by the notice lis pendens as to the liens incident to and arising out of a judgment subsequently rendered against his grantor, and if the judgment lien is effective only against the interest of the judgment,—as it is believed has been conclusively shown by the decisions of this court,—the conclusion is inevitable that the lien of the judgment can have no relation back of its origin to the prejudice of a purchaser of real property of the defendant pending suit for the recovery only of a money judgment. This conclusion has been reached on other lines of inquiry, as will appear by the following quotations and the cases cited in support of each: "A judgment will not be considered to relate to the first day of the term for the purpose of giving it priority over a conveyance to a purchaser for value and without notice." 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 115, citing in note the case following: Morgan v. Sims, 26 Ga. 283. See also Skipwith v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh, 272, 81 Am. Dec. 642; Withers v. Carter, 4 Gratt. 407, 50 Am. Dec. 78; Brockenbrough v. Brockenbrough, 81 Gratt. 590. In § 442 of Black on Judgments, is found the following language: "As against intervening purchasers, it may be regarded as settled that the lien of a subsequent judgment will not attach, justice forbidding that in such a case it should relate back to a time anterior to the conveyance,—citing Morgan v. Sims, 26 Ga. 283, and Pope v. Brandon, 3 Stew. (Ala.) 401, 20 Am. Dec. 49. In § 269 of 2 Freeman on Judgments the rule is thus stated: "However the fiction of law by which judgments are considered as being rendered on the first day of the term may affect one judgment lien in a contest with other liens of the same nature, it seems to be generally conceded that it cannot prejudice the interests of bona fide purchasers. Whenever a purchaser, before the signing of judgment, without notice, and without being guilty of any fraud, acquires an interest in real estate, that interest cannot be charged with the lien of any judgment subsequently entered against his grantor, though such judgment might, as between itself and other judgments, rank as though entered at the beginning of the term, and at some time prior to its actual rendition. In Virginia, the rule that judgments relate to the first day of the term has always prevailed, unless the court in fact met for the term on a day subsequent to that appointed by law for the first day of the term, in which case a judgment lien was decided not to overreach a conveyance recorded before the day on which the court met, though after the time when it ought to have met. In order to rank as of the first day of the term at which it was rendered, the judgment must be the final determination of an action which was in such a condition that it might have been tried and disposed of on the first day if it had happened to have the first place on the calendar. The reason why judgments rendered at different dates were ever treated as of equal rank was because all the cases ready to be tried at the opening of a given term were equally entitled to the precedence arising from being first decided; and, in order to avoid giving any suitor an advantage due entirely to the fortuitous circumstance that his cause was first called for trial, it was thought proper by aid of a legal fiction, to assign his judgment a place in no wise superior to that assigned to others equally entitled to precedence." It is the belief that an examination of the cases upon this subject will sustain the utterances of the text writers quoted from, in relation to conveyances of real estate made during the term at which judgment is rendered. The language last above quoted indicates the reason why the statute fixed the rule as between lienors by virtue of judgments, and it is believed that portion of the statute should not be extended so as to include rights other than those in the nature of liens upon the property in the hands of a judgment debtor at the time of the rendition of judgment.

In thus broadly stating the rule as to conveyances made during the term at which judgment is subsequently rendered, the case of Kellerman v. Aultman, 80 Fed. Rep. 888, has not been overlooked. In the case referred to, Brewer, Circuit Judge, after quoting § 477 of the Code of Civil Procedure, used the following language: "As the action in which the judgment of Aultman v. Van Slyke was rendered was commenced before the January term, the plain import of the language of this section carried the judgment lien back to the first of the term, and to a date before the conveyance of Van Slyke. This section is identical with those found in the statutes of Ohio and Kansas, and has by the courts of those states as well as of this, received a uniform construction. Urbana Bank v. Baldwin, 3 Ohio, 65; Jackson v. Luce, 14 Ohio, 514; Davis v. Messenger, 17 Ohio St. 231; Kiser v. Sawyer, 4 Kan. 503; Miller v. Finn, 1 Neb. 294; Colt v. DuBois, 7 Neb. 394. In this last case the court uses this language: 'The rule will not be questioned that under our statutes relative to judgment liens, all judgments rendered during the term, in actions commenced prior thereto, are liens on all the lands of the debtor within the county from the first day of the term.' These authorities, especially those from the supreme court of this state, construing the effect of one of its statutes, put the question at rest." It is clear from the language of Brewer, J., just quoted, that his opinion was largely based upon the language quoted from Colt v. DuBois, 7 Neb. 393. As illustrating the slight examination the learned judge must have given to that case, it will be profitable to examine the facts under consideration in the case of Colt v. DuBois. From the opinion of Gantt, Ch. J., we learn that on the 18th of October, 1872, O. J. Martin, one of the defendants, acquired possession of a certain tract of land in Lancaster county, Nebraska. The remaining statement of facts I quote from the opinion, as well as the language quoted by Brewer, J., in the connection in which it occurred; That "in August, 1872, Isalah Coppuck commenced an action against O. J. Martin in the district court of said county; and on the 30th of October, 1872, at a regular term of said court, which was begun on the 1st day of the same month, he recovered a judgment against said defendant Martin in said action. Afterwards Coppuck assigned this judgment to defendant J. W. Hartley, who thereby became the legal owner of the same. On the 2d of November, 1874, O. J. Martin and Ann, his wife, executed and delivered to S. C. Colt, plaintiff in error, a mortgage on all the above described lands. The plaintiff complains that, under these facts, the court below erred in deciding that the Coppuck judgment assigned to Hartley had priority of lien over his mortgage. It is insisted that the judgment in this case has relation to the first day of the term at which it was rendered; and, as all the lands described were subsequently acquired by defendant O. J. Martin, the judgment created no lien upon any of these lands, though the title was acquired before the rendition of the judgment, and therefore the plaintiff's mortgage has priority of lien over the judgment. The rule will not be questioned that, under our statute relative to judgment liens, all judgments rendered during the term in actions commenced prior thereto are liens on all the lands of the debtor within the county from the first day of the term. This interpretation is given to the statute in the case of Miller v. Finn, 1 Neb. 294, and it places all such judgments entered at the same term upon equality in regard to liens, and thereby does equal justice to creditors whose judgments are necessarily entered on different days of the term." The quotation which has just been made includes the language quoted by Brewer, J., which he regards as decisive of the question as to the rights of a grantee under a deed made during a term at a date prior to the rendition of the judgment. The case actually under consideration by this court in the case of Colt v. DuBois, 7 Neb. 393, involved the right of a judgment lien holder as against a mortgagee, not as against the grantee under a deed. The case of Miller v. Finn, relied upon by Brewer, J., in that opinion, is correctly and fully summarized in the language which we have just quoted from Colt v. DuBois. It will thus be seen that in neither of the Nebraska cases relied upon by Brewer, J., was there involved any question of the rights of the holder of real estate under a deed. This distinction is important in view of the provisions of § 50, chap. 73, that every conveyance of real estate shall pass all the interest of the grantor therein unless a contrary intent can be reasonably inferred from the terms used. As to a mortgage, the provisions of § 55 of said chapter 73, are that, "in the absence of stipulations to the contrary, the grantor of real estate retains the legal title and right of possession thereof;" and the rule governing mortgages affords no analogy as to the principle which should be applied to absolute conveyances. The other cases cited by Brewer, J., in Kellerman v. Aultman, are equally wide of the mark. For instance, in Urbana Bank v. Baldwin, 3 Ohio, 65, the entire opinion of the court is as follows: "The case may be a hard one, but the law is clear in favor of the plaintiff's lien. The suit was pending on the first day of the term, and when that is the case, the judgment relates back to that day, no matter on what day of the term it was confessed. There can be no reason for the court to restrain the words of the statute in this case, that would not apply to every other. It does not follow that the lien must extend to the first day of every term, if no process was then pending. It is sufficient, however, to decide that case, when it comes up for decision." The principle decided in the case of Jackson v. Luce, 14 Ohio, 514, cited by Brewer, J., in support of his conclusion, is comprehensively stated in the syllabus in the following language: "A judgment entered by confession during the term of the court of common pleas operates as a lien upon the land of the judgment debtor from the first day of the term, and is to be preferred to the lien of a mortgage, executed before, but not recorded till after, the commencement of the term." The sole remaining case cited by Brewer, J., is that of Kiser v. Sawyer, 4 Kan. 508, in which the court had under consideration the term "lands, tenements, and hereditaments," and the question was whether or not a statute providing that the lands and tenements should be bound for the satisfaction of a judgment included an equitable as well as a legal interest therein. It was held in that case that the lien of a judgment operated against the equitable as well as the legal estate in lands and tenements of the debtor, which equitable estate might be reached under the provisions of the Kansas statute applicable to cases of that kind. This was the only question that was decided, and as the supreme court of Kansas reached a different conclusion from that attained by this court in the case of Nessler v. Neher, 18 Neb. 649, in which the lien of a judgment was held not to attach to a mere equity in real estate, the Kansas case is of no value in the matter under discussion. From this review of the authorities relied upon by Brewer, J., it is apparent that the opinion rendered by him in the case of Kel-lerman v. Aultman has very little practical value, for it is evident that he gave the case but very hasty consideration. The positive terms in which the contrary rule is laid down in Black on Judgments, in the American & English Encyclopædia of Law, and in Freeman on Judgments, supported, as these text-writers are, by the authorities cited, should have a much greater weight than should be accorded to the opinion of Judge Brewer referred to.

In view of the language of our statute, the former holdings of this court, the great injustice which would be wrought by any other holding, it is believed that the lien of a judgment which is rendered subsequent to a conveyance by the defendant of real property ought not to be held superior to, or in contravention of, the interest the grantee acquired by such conveyance.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

George GOETZINGER, Resp't.,

v.

James L. ROSENFELD et al., and

W. H. Vessey and Wife, Appls.

(16 Wash. 392.)

1. A statement in appellant's brief that the court held a mortgage prior to a judgment sufficiently points out the alleged error where that is the only question presented.
2. The presumption is that a judgment obtained against a husband, and which is claimed to be a lien upon community property, was for a community debt, if there is no proof on the subject.
3. The law divides the day where equity requires it.
4. A mortgage to secure an antecedent debt which is filed before the actual entry of a judgment which was filed soon afterward on the same afternoon will not have priority over the judgment, but their liens will be equal.

(February 2, 1897.)

A PPEAL of Vessey and wife from a judgment of the Superior Court for Yakima County giving plaintiff's mortgage upon the property of Rosenfeld priority over a judgment which had been obtained by appellants against Rosenfeld. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Whitson & Parker, for appellants:

Does the law take note in this kind of a case of the fraction of a day?

Freeman on Judgments, vol. 2, 4th ed. § 870, says there are three classes of cases to which the doctrine may apply: (1) Those involving the precedence of judgment liens between one another; (2) those involving the priority of judgments and other liens; and (3) those involving the right of purchaser in good faith prior to actual rendition and docketing of the judgment.

This case falls within the second class.

The common-law rule is that the judgment takes effect as of the first day of the term, and a conveyance filed in the meantime, that is, after the first day, is inferior to the judgment lien.

2 Freem. Judgm. 4th ed. § 870; Boyer's Estate, 51 Pa. 432, 91 Am. Dec. 129.

Where the mortgage is filed the same day of the rendition of the judgment, the law, taking no note of the fraction of a day, will presume that the judgment was entered at the regular hour of the convening of the courts and that the judgment has priority.

Boyer's Estate, 51 Pa. 432, 91 Am. Dec. 129; Follett v. Hall, 16 Ohio, 111, 47 Am. Dec. 865.

Some authorities hold that inasmuch as the law takes no notice of the fraction of a day, hence they will be presumed to have been filed at the same time, and are of equal rank.

Murfrees v. Carmack, 4 Yerg. 270, 26 Am. Dec. 232; Follett v. Hall, 16 Ohio, 111, 47 Am. Dec. 865; Hendrickson's Appeal, 24 Pa. 863; Olaason's Appeal, 22 Pa. 359.

Messrs. H. J. Snively and Fred Miller for respondent.

Reavis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff commenced an action in the superior court of Yakima county to foreclose a mortgage executed by the defendant Rosenfeld and wife to plaintiff upon certain real estate in the city of North Yakima. The mortgage was dated the 10th day of May, 1894, and filed for record on that day at 3 o'clock P. M. On the same day the defendant W. H. Vessey obtained a judgment against defendant J. L. Rosenfeld in the superior court of Yakima county, which was entered in the journal as of that day. In the complaint it was alleged that defendants Vessey and wife claimed an interest in the real estate described in plaintiff's mortgage, but that the claim of Vessey and wife was inferior to that of plaintiff. Vessey and wife answered, and set up the judgment, claimed a lien thereunder, and alleged that at the date thereof Rosenfeld and wife were the owners of the real estate as community property, and that the judgment was a community debt, and alleged that the lien of the judgment was superior to that of the mortgage. The court heard oral testimony to determine the question of the actual time of filing for record of both the judgment and the mortgage, and held, upon the proof taken, that the mortgage was filed first, and was therefore prior to the lien of the judgment, and should be first satisfied out of the proceeds of the real estate mortgaged.

Respondent moves to strike appellants' brief on three grounds: (1) That the appellants are made to appear as plaintiffs, and the respondent as one of the defendants; (2) that the errors relied upon to reverse the judgment are not clearly pointed out; (3) that the finding appealed from is not printed in the brief, nor was any finding that the court was requested to make and which was refused. The appellants' brief states that the court held that the mortgage was prior to the lien of the judgment, and that is assigned as error. We think this sufficiently points out in this case the error complained of, as there is but a single question presented. The superior court made no special findings of fact separately from the decree, but decreed the lien of the mortgage superior to that of the judgment. Therefore it would be of no assistance to this court to print in the brief the decree, or that portion of it relating to the priority of the mortgage over the lien of the judgment; and the motion to strike the brief cannot be sustained.

Respondent maintains that the judgment of W. H. Vessey was obtained upon a community debt, and that the appellants could not prorate with the respondent as against the community interests of Sere Rosenfeld, the wife, because appellants introduced no testimony to show that it was a community debt, and there was no finding by the court upon that issue. We think the presumption, in the absence of any proof, is in favor of the judgment creditors' contention that the judgment was obtained upon a community debt, and there is no question but that the real estate, the subject of this controversy, was community property.

The single question presented here is as to the priority of the mortgage which was assigned by the court over the judgment lien. At common law the judgment lien was established on the first day of the term in which the judgment was rendered, but such rule has been generally abrogated by practice, and in some instances by statute, in this country. The rule is fixed in this state by statute. "The lien shall attach from the day of the date of said judgment." 2 Hill's Code, § 449. The court will not look further into the fraction of a day under this statute than to determine a superior equity. Where a purchaser in good faith parts with money for real estate upon a clear record, he ought to be protected against a judgment obtained upon the same day, but not actually entered at the time of the advancement of the money; and we think the same protection should reasonably be afforded a mortgagee who actually advances money upon the security on a clear record. Mr. Freeman, in his treatise on Judgments, says: "It seems to be well settled that unless the law provides for fractions of days, all judgments entered on the same day will be regarded as if entered at the same time, and as creating liens equal in point of priority, and entitled to be paid pro rata out of the debtor's real estate. Still this rule does not prevail universally. In many instances courts have inquired, even as between different judgments, the precise time when they were entered or docketed, and decided that the law will take notice of fractions of days in the contests between creditors seeking to have funds realized from the sale of lands applied in satisfaction of their judgment liens. Upon principle, one who advances money and takes a mortgage or deed of trust as security ought to be protected from secret liens to the same extent as if he were a purchaser of the property taking a conveyance of the legal title. The authorities, however, do not concur in this conclusion. In some of them, mortgagees are treated with the same indulgence granted to purchasers." 2 Freem. Judgm. 4th ed. § 370. In Pennsylvania the rule is that a mortgage and judgment entered on the same day will be regarded as taking effect simultaneously and as entitled to be paid pro rata. But some courts while conceding the necessity to ascertain the hour of the entry of the lien, nevertheless refuse to enter into any examination beyond the record, and the question is determined upon the record alone. But the weight of authority, and certainly sound principle, would seem to justify an inquiry into the precise time at which the judgment was entered, by less than record proof. The maxim that the law divides the day where equity requires it, would seem to be the correct one; and the law ought to divide the day in favor of one who loans money, or parts with anything valuable, when the inducement for his action is the security given him upon the then unencumbered real estate of the borrower. We do not think that the equity of the mortgage, where he has advanced his money, is necessarily or ordinarily inferior to the equity of a purchaser. In this cause the superior court heard other than record testimony to determine the precise time of the filing of the judgment, and also of the mortgage, and, while there was some conflict in the testimony of the witnesses, we think the court found correctly that the mortgage, which bore upon its face the hour of filing,—3 o'clock in the afternoon,—was placed on record before the judgment. It appeared from the testimony of counsel for the plaintiff, the mortgagee, that the time of the filing of the judgment was fixed in their memories, because plaintiff's claim had been held by them for collection for a considerable time, and they were watching the progress of the trial between Vessey and Rosenfeld in order to file their mortgage before the judgment was actually entered. One of the attorneys for plaintiff testified: "The judgment entry in said cause was not filed until after the mortgage sued on here was filed. I am certain of this, because we had the claim of plaintiff for collection, and we were watching it for the purpose of getting in ahead of the judgment, and my attention was particularly called to it at the time." The judgment of Vessey was evidently filed very shortly after the mortgage the same afternoon, after 8 o'clock. There was no new consideration whatever for the execution of the mortgage held by plaintiff. It was executed to secure an antecedent debt. We cannot place this mortgage in the same rank with one which was executed upon a present valuable consideration and where the mortgagee in good faith advanced his money upon the faith of an existing clear record of unencumbered real estate. We think that here the court, having inquired into the fraction of the day to determine the equities between the lien of the judgment and the mortgage, should, upon the testimony, have found them equal, and directed that they be prorated in the proceeds from the real estate covered by both liens.

The cause is therefore reversed, with the direction to the superior court to modify its decree in accordance with this opinion.

(..... Wash.)

1. Delay and negligence of city officers in providing a fund for the payment of street-grade warrants by levy and special tax or assessment will not render the city liable to an action, at least so long as the assessment plan can be enforced in any way.
2. Where one of two parties must suffer, the loss should fall upon the one who has had the best opportunity to protect himself, and is the most at fault.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to compel payment of the amount due on certain street-grade warrants because of defendant's failure to enforce payment of them by the proper persons. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Plummer & Thayer, for appellant:

In Stephens v. Spokane, 14 Wash. 296, this court held that the city was not liable for negligence in failing to create the special fund upon which these warrants were drawn unless the negligence had proceeded to such an extent as to develop a loss of power upon the part of the city to create the fund, as, for instance, if the city had allowed the statute of limitations to run against the street-assessment liens; in such a case the city would be liable.

Messrs. Kennan & Belden, for respondent:

This court, on December 15, 1896, in McEwan v. Spokane, 16 Wash. 212, held that the city was liable for the nonpayment of similar warrants.

The remedy or means of enforcing a contract is a part of that obligation of a contract which the Constitution protects against being impaired by the law of a state.

Walker v. Whitehead, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 314, 21 L. ed. 357; United States, Von Hoffman, v. Quincy, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 585, 18 L. ed. 403.

Scott, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff brought this action to recover the amount due on certain street-grade warrants originally issued to one Massey, and payable out of the Victoria street-grade fund, and, having obtained a general judgment against the city therefor, the city has appealed. The foundation of the plaintiff's right of action, as presented in the briefs, was the delay and negligence on the part of the city's officers in providing the fund. The court also found, and that issue seems to have been presented in the pleadings, that the right to enforce collection of the special assessments was lost. The appellant (defendant) contests this finding, but, as the respondent does not seem to rely on it, we will not look into the evidence thereon at this time. It may become material, however, in the ultimate disposition of the case, and will be referred to later.

Questions relating to the character and enforcement of such liens have been before the court upon a number of former occasions, and our decisions thereon have in an instance or two been inconsistent and conflicting. It is a matter of common knowledge that most of the cities and towns here are heavily burdened with debt aside from these warrants, and, furthermore, that there is a large amount of this class of paper outstanding, and the question of the general liability of such municipalities, therefore, is of the utmost importance. Consequently, the gravest responsibility rests upon the court to settle and determine, as far as possible, the principles governing such liability, if it exists, with certainty and precision as the questions are presented. Owing to the paramount importance of the subject, and the various decisions thereon heretofore rendered, nearly all of which are in some measure involved in this and one or two other street-warrant cases submitted and now before us for our consideration, we have deemed it advisable at this time to review to some extent some of the cases we have heretofore decided relating thereto, and also some cases from other states on the subject, for the purpose of definitely settling, if possible, a few principles. The matter may also call for a short notice of some other kindred questions discussed in those cases not necessarily involved in this one.

In Baker v. Seattle, 2 Wash. 576, the court held that such warrants, payable out of a particular fund, could not be considered as a general municipal liability with reference to the constitutional limitation on the amount of indebtedness a city could contract. There was no thought at that time that they ever could become such a liability here. In Soule v. Seattle, 6 Wash. 815 and 824, the court held that where a city had reached its constitutional limit of indebtedness it had no power to render itself liable for the cost of street improvements contracted for subsequent thereto, although the city failed to levy an assessment, and provide a special fund to pay for such improvements, as it had contracted to do. The principle was also recognized that where there was a lack of statutory authority to construct such improvements by a general tax, or from the general funds of the city, or where there was a failure to acquire jurisdiction of the subject-matter, there could be no general liability established against the city in any way. The city of Seattle had power to construct such improvement under its charter by a general tax. The city of Spokane has that power (Stephens v. Spokane, 11 Wash. 41); and it seems to be generally, though not universally, true of the various towns and cities of the state. It was also said in Soule v. Seattle that an action brought to establish a general liability against the city, where there had been a failure to provide the special fund, was not in the nature of an action ex delicto, but was for a breach of the original contract, or upon an implied agreement on the part of the city to pay in case of a failure to provide the special fund, where there was no express provision in the contract holding the city generally liable. We will next refer to the case of Stephens v. Spokane, 11 Wash. 41, where a judgment had been rendered in favor of the city, upon a demurrer interposed to the complaint, and the cause was reversed here, the court holding that the delay upon the part of the city to provide the special fund, as alleged, was sufficient to establish a general liability. There was no contention that the city had lost its right to proceed with the assessments. Thereafter, in Thomas v. Olympia, 12 Wash. 465, the court discussed and distinguished the cases of Soule v. Seattle, 6 Wash. 815 and 824, and Stephens v. Spokane, 11 Wash. 41, and held that where, in the case of a contract for street improvements to be paid out of a particular fund, the city had undertaken in good faith to collect the assessment, but had been unable to do so, owing to decisions of the courts, and was proceeding to make a new assessment, it could not be held liable for the cost of the improvements out of its general fund, and that where the contract provided; as in that case, that the contract would look only to the special fund, he had no right at all to proceed against the city generally for the negligence of its officers. When the case of Stephens v. Spokane was again before this court (14 Wash. 298 and 308), where the city had appealed from a judgment rendered against it upon the trial, the court held that delay in providing the fund was not sufficient to enable the plaintiff to recover of the city but that it must appear that there was a loss of power to further prosecute the assessment, and that the city could not bind itself to create the fund within a certain time. Whatever inconsistency, if any, there may have been between these two cases, is immaterial here. In McKwan v. Spokane, 16 Wash. 212, the court held that where the city had contracted to provide the fund in the shortest possible time under its charter and ordinances, and had failed to do so, and had unreasonably delayed enforcing the assessments, it was liable generally, and that the city, and not the contractors, must look after the assessment, and enforce its collection. The right to recover was placed on the ground of delay alone. There was no contention that the statute of limitations had run against all of the special assessments, but the right to recover was sustained as to all of the warrants, regardless of such question. In Bank of British Columbia v. Port Townsend, 16 Wash. 450, while it was in effect held that an action would lie against the city where there was a failure to provide the fund, there was no discussion of that question. The case was disposed of on a demurrer to the complaint. Although the complaint alleged that the right to prosecute the assessments was lost, no importance was attached to it. In fact, the mooted question was other than that, as the opinion shows, and it was held that the complaint stated a cause of action. It was also held that, unless the contract was authorized by an ordinance, there could be no recovery. The most of these decisions were by a majority of the court only. The case of McKwan v. Spokane is in straight conflict with the decision rendered in Stephens v. Spokane, when it was last before the court, although there was no direct expressed intent to overrule it, and the same is true, but not in so great a degree, perhaps, of the case of Bank of British Columbia v. Port Townsend.

We will first note some of the propositions upon which there was no conflict in the decisions, and which we think may safely be regarded as settled here. One is that there can be no general liability contracted or established when the municipality has reached the limit of its indebtedness. Baker v. Seattle, 2 Wash. 576; Soule v. Seattle, 6 Wash. 815, 824; Winston v. Spokane, 12 Wash. 524. The first two cases held that indebtedness of that character was not a general indebtedness, and that the constitutional limitation did not apply. If such claims can subsequently become general liabilities against municipalities, serious complications are likely to arise, for in some instances the debt limit would undoubtedly be reached before all of such claims are provided for, and there might be some question as to which of them should be entitled to priority. If the contract in terms purposed to bind the city generally, and was lawfully entered into, the question should be determined with reference to the financial condition when such contract was made (West v. Ohehalis, 12 Wash. 869); and the priority of the respective times of execution would be controlling in determining the question as between the various contracts where only a part of them could be made a general charge within the debt limit. Where the contract contained no such provision or no binding provision in that respect, and the right is founded on the breach of the contract in failing to provide the fund, a different question arises, and it must be decided with reference to the time either when the delinquency arose or when it should be judicially determined. Unless the latter time governs, there might be some question as to when the responsibility for the unreasonable delay becomes fixed, especially considering the fact that the city could not bind itself to provide the fund in a certain time, or in the shortest possible time, as has been sometimes attempted. Stephens v. Spokane, 14 Wash. 298 and 303.

Another proposition determined is that, where there was no power to construct the improvements in the first instance out of the general fund, the city cannot be made liable for a failure to provide the special fund. Mindley v. Hull, 13 Wash. 236. In a number of the foregoing cases, one, and sometimes two, members of the court dissented, or did not concur in the opinion, the grounds of disagreement generally not being stated, and, of course, they are not particularly important, but it may be well to observe that it was occasionally upon some point not discussed in the opinion, such as a different construction of the facts, or as to the application of the principle discussed to the case, which the nonconcurring members thought would require a different holding. There may have been no disagreement as to the law announced in the opinion.

The next question we will consider is as to whether an unreasonable delay in collecting the special fund is sufficient to sustain a general recovery. The provision involved in this case is as follows: "The city of Spokane Falls further agrees that it will proceed at once to levy a special tax or assessment upon the property fronting upon the street to be improved as aforesaid, for the payment of the sum aforesaid, and to complete the same, and pay the sum aforesaid as herein provided; and the city expressly covenants and agrees that it will prosecute the business of levying and collecting said special tax or assessment without any delay whatever in any part of the proceedings, and within the shortest time possible under its charter and ordinances relating thereto." There was no clause in the contract in terms binding the city generally to pay, and we have held that the city could not bind itself to provide the fund in a specified time. Stephens v. Spokane, 14 Wash. 298 and 303. So, this clause did not add very much strength to the contract, for, in the absence of it, the city officers could doubtless be compelled to proceed diligently in collecting the fund. We have held also that the warrant holders could mandamus the city officers to proceed to collect the assessment. Soule v. Seattle, 6 Wash. 315, 324, citing Himmelmann v. Cofran, 86 Cal. 411, which was a proceeding by mandamus. See also Nate, Hemen, v. Ballard, 16 Wash. 418, which was a mandamus proceeding, where the relator was successful in obtaining a judgment against the city officers to proceed. Other authorities sustaining this proposition are Reock v. Newark, 33 N. J. L. 129; Wren v. Indianapolis, 96 Ind. 206; and Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 437; 38 L. R. A.

and more might be cited. There are some authorities against this proposition, one being Diamond Match Co. v. Powers, 51 Mich. 145, where it was held that mandamus is not adapted to cases calling for continuous action, but only to enforce a particular act. But if the remedy by mandamus proves inadequate or ineffective, or if for any other reason the proceedings could not be effectively enforced through the regular channels, we approve the doctrine laid down in Soule v. Seattle, 6 Wash. 315 and 324, that the courts could make and enforce the assessment. There is no reason why an action in equity could not be effectual to enforce and protect the rights of all parties. Such a right has been recognized and enforced, notwithstanding the fact that mandamus would lie. Louisville v. Hyatt, 5 B. Mon. 199. Probably a city taxpayer outside of the particular assessment district could mandamus the city officers to proceed to collect the special assessments in order to prevent the expense of the improvement from becoming a general charge against the city to his injury, but, as between such taxpayer and the warrant holder, justice would require that the burden should be placed on the latter, for he is a party directly and primarily interested. Such outside taxpayer would have no voice in the proceedings originally, unless, perhaps, where the contract in terms bound the city generally. He would have no right to remonstrate against the improvement, as is usually given to the taxpayers in the district, and would not be heard to contest or resist the contemplated action. In most instances where the liability of the city has been sustained, it has been on the ground that the city officers were the agents of the entire city, and that the city was liable for a failure upon their part to collect the fund. The decisions, however, have not been uniform in this respect, for in some cases it has been held that the city officers in such instances are not the agents of the entire city, but simply the agents of the particular district, for the purpose of carrying into effect a special improvement concerning the district.

An investigation of the decisions elsewhere upon the subject of such claims shows them to be in hopeless conflict. They are complicated also by the varying conditions of the respective contracts. In some instances the city had power to construct the improvement by a general tax. In others the power was limited to an assessment upon the property benefited. Some of the contracts contained a guaranty that the city would provide the fund. In some cases the rights of the contractors were expressly limited by the contract to the special assessment, there being a provision that they would in no event look to the city for payment, and there is a conflict in the decisions here also, for in some cases, notwithstanding such a provision, it has been held that the city was liable generally where the fund had not been provided through the fault or negligence of the city officers. In New York the doctrine of a general municipal liability in such cases is recognized. The latest case from that state to which our attention has been called is Reilly v. Albany, 112 N. Y. 80. In that case the city was held liable on such a contract for an unreasonable delay in collecting the special assessments.

There are a number of New York decisions upon this subject, and we shall not undertake to review them all, but will call attention to a few of them where some new features are involved. In Cummingy v. Brooklyn, 11 Paige, 596, the same ruling was had. It was said that the "local tax is a fund which has been provided by the legislature to reimburse the corporation for the expenses of an improvement which it has either paid or become liable to pay. And if the corporation, voluntarily or by compulsion, pays such expenses out of its general funds, any citizen who pays taxes may apply to the proper tribunal to compel the corporation to cause the general fund to be reimbursed, by an assessment and collection of the expense of such improvement from the owners of the property benefited, or out of the property itself, as authorized and directed by the charter." There may have been some conflict in the New York cases; at least, they are not clearly reconcilable. In the earlier case of Lake v. Williamsburgh, 4 Denio, 520, it seems to have been held that there was no such liability, and it was intimated that there might be an action on the case against the city officers personally for a failure to perform their duties. Also, see Tone v. New York, 70 N. Y. 157; New York & B. Saw-mill & L. Co. v. Brooklyn, 71 N. Y. 580; and McOullough v. Brooklyn, 28 Wend. 458,—to the same effect apparently. But the later case of Reilly v. Albany, 113 N. Y. 80, and McCormack v. Brooklyn, 108 N. Y. 49, held that there was such a liability, and the decisions of that state may fairly be said to support the doctrine. In Kansas the doctrine has been sustained. In Atchison v. Byrnes, 22 Kan. 65, the city was held generally liable, citing Leavenworth v. Mills, 6 Kan. 288, and Wyandotte v. Zeitz, 21 Kan. 649. See also Atchison v. Leu, 48 Kan. 128. The force of these decisions, however, as authority here, is much weakened by the holding that the contractor had no other remedy than to sue the city generally. The right to mandamus the board to enforce making the assessment was not recognized or discussed. The cases took the view also that the city was bound in the first instance, and that the provision for assessing the property benefited was intended to reimburse the general fund. In Leavenworth v. Rankin, 2 Kan. 357, it was held that the mode prescribed to create a general liability must be pursued, and the rule with regard to strict construction of the powers of municipal officers and agents was recognized. It seems that the prescribed mode had been pursued in the other cases. In Oregon the doctrine has been sustained. In Portland Lumber & Mfg. Co. v. East Portland, 18 Or. 21, 6 L. R. A. 290, a general liability was recognized, and the case seemed to proceed on the ground also that the right upon the part of the city to collect the special assessment was lost or inoperative. In the opinion of Lord, J., it is stated that it might be necessary to get additional legislation to that end. In that case the opinion of Strathan, J., holds that the method of charging the city might be different from that required under the charter for contracting a general obligation, but in that state the decisions have gone to an extreme in sustaining such a liability. In North Pacific Lumbering &

Mfg. Co. v. East Portland, 14 Or. 8, the city was held liable, although it could not have contracted a direct general liability in the first instance. In Commercial Nat. Bank v. Portland, 24 Or. 188, it was held that a stipulation providing that a contractor should look only to the particular fund would not relieve the city from general liability in the case of negligence in failing to provide the fund. In Little v. Portland, 26 Or. 235, it was held by that court that the liability for negligently failing to raise such a fund was one arising ex delicto, and that the city was liable, regardless of its debt limit. Upon that theory the holdings of the court could be sustained. But in our opinion, the authorities elsewhere do not support the proposition that such an action sounds in tort. At least, that is the general view taken, and we have followed it. Consequently, the decisions of that state could not be regarded as bearing strongly here upon the doctrine of a general liability. In Illinois the doctrine of a general liability has been indorsed, and to the extreme limit also in an instance or two. In Maher v. Chicago, 88 Ill. 266, it was held that a city could be estopped where it proceeded in disregard of its own ordinances; also that, notwithstanding an express provision in the contract to look only to the special fund, the city would be liable generally in case of an unreasonable delay. In the later case of Chicago v. People, 48 Ill. 416, it was held, in a mandamus proceeding to compel payment, that the contractor was bound by such a stipulation, it appearing that the city was then in good faith proceeding with the collection of the assessment. And Maher v. Chicago, 88 Ill. 266, was distinguished on the ground that there a special assessment could not be levied for want of power, and the court said it would hold differently in the case before it if the city were acting in bad faith, such as would be indicated by an unreasonable delay, or if there were defects in the special assessment proceedings which the city could not cure. In Chicago v. Sexton, 115 Ill. 280, the city was held liable for want of fidelity, or for the negligence of those who were authorized to act for it, and it was held that such liability was not within the limitation in regard to the creation of indebtedness. This case involved a building contract. But in Gaddis v. Richland County, 92 Ill. 119, which was a railroad bond case, in discussing the acts of public officers, it was held that they must follow the mode prescribed by law in order to create an indebtedness, and the doctrine of strict construction was recognized. These last two cases would seem to be inconsistent in so far as the debt limit, at least in the Sexton Case, was concerned. In Morgan v. Dubuque, 28 Iowa, 575, it was held that the city was liable for such improvements where there was a failure for an unreasonable time to collect the assessments. There was a stipulation in the contract for payment when the assessments were collected. There was no discussion of the question in the opinion. In Bucroft v. Council Bluffs, 63 Iowa, 646, which involved a grading contract, where the contractor had agreed to take for his pay assessment certificates upon owners of abutting property, and there was no power to assess such owners therefor, it was held that the city was liable for the contract price. The city had power to construct such improvements out of its general fund, and it was held that the assumption of power to make the assessment was sufficient to bind the city. See also Scofield v. Council Bluffs, 69 Iowa, 695; Polk County Sav. Bank v. State, 69 Iowa, 24. The decisions in that state support the general liability doctrine. The same is also true of the state of Kentucky, according to the following decisions before us: In Louisville v. Hyatt, 5 B. Mon. 199, which was an action in equity to enforce such assessments against the property owners, and also to recover payment of the city, where the contract provided that the contractors would look to the lotowners for payment, it was held, the assessment being void, that the contractors could recover of the city, the city having power to construct such improvements out of its general fund. See, also Kearney v. Covington, 1 Met. (Ky.) 839. It was said in that case, although not necessary to its decision, that the city would be liable even if it had no power to construct such improvements out of its general fund. In Allen v. Janesville, 35 Wis. 408, where the assessment was void, and could not be cured, the city was held liable. It was said that no limitation on the general power to make a binding contract by the city had been disregarded. See also Eilert v. Oakkosh, 14 Wis. 587.

It may be said that the decisions in New York, Illinois, Iowa, Kentucky, and Wisconsin fairly support the doctrine of a general liability here, but some of them are weakened by their decisions in other cases holding to a strict construction with reference to the acts of municipal officers, the same principle being involved. In California the doctrine of such a liability has been partially recognized, but upon a different ground. In Argenti v. San Francisco, 16 Cal. 256, the city had collected a portion of the assessment, which had been transferred to its general fund. It was held that the city was primarily liable. In the opinion of Field, J., it was held that the mode for contracting a general liability had been pursued; that it was necessary to follow the mode, and that the city must proceed by an ordinance where one was required; also, that an estoppel would not arise upon the ground that the whole city had been benefited. Field, J., said, in part: "But I place my concurrence in the judgment heretofore rendered in this case upon the validity of the contracts with the city, which were completed by the acceptance of the proposals of the contractors, and the primary liability of the city for the work performed thereunder. I have been thus explicit, because I do not consider that, independent of such contracts, any liability would attach to the city for the improvement of the streets. A municipal corporation can only act in the cases and in the mode prescribed by its charter, and for street improvements of a local nature, express contracts, authorized by ordinance, are necessary to create a liability. The doctrine of liability, as upon implied contracts, has no application to cases of this character. In McCracken v. San Francisco, 16 Cal. 591, it was held that there could be no ratification where there was no original power to make the contract, and that, where the power could only be exercised in a particular manner, the ratification must pursue the same mode, the doctrine of strict construction being recognized. See also McCoy v. Bryant, 58 Cal. 247, on the question of limited powers and manner of proceeding, and Zottman v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 97, 81 Am. Dec. 96, for comments on former California cases. These decisions cannot be said to support a general liability here. On the contrary, they support the propositions that the prescribed mode of contracting must be pursued; and that the liability cannot arise by estoppel, and in no event could a liability in excess of the power to contract be created. The same is true, we think, of Texas, Ohio, and Michigan, in so far as we are enlightened by the decisions before us. In Bryan v. Page, 51 Tex. 532, 32 Am. Rep. 687, which was an action to recover for services as an attorney, it was held that, where the city had the power to employ by ordinance, its officers could not employ in the absence of one; that the city was not bound on the implied contract, and was not estopped in consequence of having had the benefit of the services. In Creighton v. Toledo, 18 Ohio St. 447, where the contractor was empowered to collect the assessments, and where some of the property sold thereunder did not bring enough to meet the amount of the assessments thereon, it was held that, where there was an express contract, none could be implied, and, the mode of payment having been stipulated, the contractor was bound by it, notwithstanding there was a deficiency, and that there could be no implied guaranty upon the part of the city that the amount should be sufficient. In Goodrich v. Detroit, 12 Mich. 279, which involved a paving contract which had been performed by a contractor who was to be paid out of the special fund, and where the special assessments therefor had been collected by the city collector, but which he had not paid over to the city treasurer, and was thought to have misappropriated, a suit being pending upon his bond therefor, it was held that, as the contract provided for payment when the assessments were collected by the city collector and paid over to the treasurer, the contractor could not recover of the city on the facts shown although the city had agreed to collect the assessments with reasonable care and despatch. It was shown that the suit against the collector was brought in November, 1861, a demurrer was interposed in January, 1862, and no further steps had been taken in the prosecution of the action when the contractor sued the city, in May, 1863. It was held that the charge of negligence was not sustained by the facts shown, but it does not clearly appear what the court would have held if it had thought negligence was established by the agreed case. The city had no power to construct such improvements out of its general fund. The above cases from the last-mentioned four states are not referred to as being directly and strongly against the doctrine of a general liability here in all its phases, but as being against some of the grounds on which a liability is urged in other states, and as tending against it generally, and in harmony with our holdings upon like principles in many instances. See Sutton v. St. Joseph, 60 Mo. 153, which is the latest adjudication in that state called to our attention, is against the doctrine squarely, and in effect overruled an earlier case, viz., Fisher v. St. Louis, 44 Mo. 482, taking a different view. It was held also that a charge of negligence was not sustained by a showing of defective proceedings by the council. In New Jersey the decisions seem to conflict as to the principle involved. In Reock v. Newark, 88 N. J. L. 129, which was an action by a property owner to recover damages for the alteration of a grade in improving a street where such damages were to be paid by an assessment upon the property benefited by the improvement, and where the council had neglected to make the assessment, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover. In the later case of Knapp v. Hoboken, 88 N. J. L. 871, which was an action upon improvement certificates issued to a contractor for improving a street where the city had neglected to collect the assessments on property benefited, a contrary principle is recognized, and the right to recover was sustained, regardless of whether the city could collect the amounts. But in a still later case, viz., Paret v. Bayonne, 40 N. J. L. 833, the principle adopted in Reock v. Newark was reaffirmed, the court saying: "The rule attempted to be vindicated in this case is plainly this: that by a certain course of law a city can be made liable, by a suit, for the expenses incurred in taking land for a public improvement, and the burden imposed upon the city at large, although the charter prescribes the mode of having such expenses assessed, and provides for their payment by the owners of the particular lands specially benefited. It is obvious that this is an endeavor to subvert the legislative scheme, which is to have the damages ascertained in an appointed manner, and paid by a certain class of persons. This, it has been repeatedly decided in this state, cannot be done." Here, in fact, a much stronger case was presented in favor of the claimant than the last one referred to, for, instead of a voluntary contractor, the court was dealing with the rights of a man whose land was taken from him by compulsory process for the purposes of the improvement. But neither of the former cases was referred to, and this is the latest case from that state called to our attention. In Indiana the non-liability doctrine is strongly sustained by a line of decisions. The latest before us is that of Quill v. Indianapolis, 124 Ind. 292, 7 L. R. A. 681, where it is held that, in making and collecting such assessments the city authorities do not act as the general agents of the city, but as special agents of the district; also, that issuing bonds or certificates which show upon their face that they are issued in the course of constructing a street improvement, and are payable out of a special fund to be derived from assessments upon the property bordering on the street, is very far from creating a debt against the city; that assessments for street improvements are upheld on the ground that the adjacent property upon which the cost of the improvement is assessed is enhanced in value to an amount equal to the sum assessed against it, and that the owners have received a pecuniary benefit which the citizens do not share in common; that the municipality as such is not benefited by the improvement, and there is hence, under the law in question, neither a legal nor a moral obligation on the city at large to pay for it. See also Montgomery County Comrs. v. Fullen, 111 Ind. 410; Wren v. Indianapolis, 96 Ind. 206; Tipton v. Jones, 77 Ind. 807; New Albany v. Sweeney, 13 Ind. 245; Johnson v. Indianapolis, 16 Ind. 237; Greencastle v. Allen, 48 Ind. 847. In the last-mentioned case it was held, where the engineer refused to make an assessment, and the council refused to issue precepts, upon a proper application, against the property holders, that a suit could not be maintained against the town, and that the contractors' remedy was by mandamus, citing many authorities.

We have held in harmony with these and other authorities upon the subject coming from states where the nonliability doctrine is recognized upon many points. For instance, in the capitol building case (Allen v. Grimes, 9 Wash. 424), it was held that, even though the state could be sued, no cause of action could be stated against it by a warrant holder, and that such holder was limited to a right to require the officers to perform their duties; that the obligations to be issued there would create no liability against the state in any manner, but only against the fund, and it never was supposed for a moment that if anything should happen to the land grant, or if any contingency should arise whereby enough money should not be forthcoming to pay the warrants, the state would be liable. It would be hard to point out a difference between the equities of that kind of a contract and an ordinary street improvement contract. Both are payable out of a particular fund. In each the respective officers might fail to perform their duties. The same is true of Winton v. Spokane, 12 Wash. 524, where we held that the obligations there in question, payable out of the water-system fund, did not constitute a city indebtedness. This case was reaffirmed in Kenyon v. Spokane (Wash.) 48 Pac. 788. The holding in Findley v. Hull, 13 Wash. 236, that there could be no recovery against the city, is not in harmony with the decisions of most of the states sustaining the general liability doctrine, but lines up with many of those on the other side of the question. The same is true of the case of Tacoma Light & W. Co. v. Tacoma, 18 Wash. 115, holding to a strict construction of the powers of municipal officers. Others might be cited holding also against the doctrine of estoppel as applied to their acts. Our decisions we believe to have been consistent on that line, except as to some of these street improvement cases. Such representatives were not originally, nor now generally, looked upon as paternal boards or officers, with general powers and responsibilities in any way affecting the citizen, but only as authorized to bind their constituents in certain specified ways. The other view is an innovation, and dangerous in principle.

The Supreme Court of the United States has held strongly to the strict construction theory as applied to municipalities and municipal officers. In a late case, that of Brenham v. German-American Bank, 144 U. S. 173, 36 L. ed. 390, it was held that power conferred upon a municipal corporation to borrow money did not authorize it to issue municipal bonds therefor, and, although the bonds which had been issued thereunder were in the hands of an innocent purchaser for value, it was held that there could be no recovery. Many cases were cited and commented on, and some earlier ones overruled. In Peaks v. New Orleans, 189 U. S. 343, 35 L. ed. 181, while the case is not exactly in point with the one before us, in that a particular board of city officers, instead of the general council, had been designated by the legislature for the carrying on of the improvement, it was held that there was no general liability upon the part of the city to make good the contract. While some importance was attached to the point mentioned, yet the argument proceeds against the right to recover of the municipality at all in such cases. In some respects the contract there in question was stronger against the city than the ordinary street improvement contract, especially that part with reference to funding the indebtedness in bonds of the city. The court, in its opinion, quoted from Cooley on Taxation (p. 416), stating, in substance, that general taxes are exacted in return for general benefits, but that special assessments are made upon the ground of special benefits to a limited portion of the community; that they are supposed to suffer no pecuniary loss thereby, their property being enhanced in value to an amount equal to the expenditure; and that "this is the idea that underlies all these levies." That being true, there is no basis for making them a public charge in such instances. Of course, it is generally put upon the ground of the negligence and agency of the city officers, but it is not well grounded. The court said there that, although the board was derelict in its duty, the city could properly say to the warrant holder, "Your remedy was by mandamus to compel prompt and efficient action by that board," and quoted approvingly from Judge Dillon as follows: "Why should all be taxed for the failure of the council to do its duty in a case where the contractor has a plain remedy, by mandamus, to compel the council to make the necessary assessment, and proceed in the collection thereof with the requisite diligence?" And the court says: "On what principle of right and justice can he [the warrant holder] ignore this remedy, and charge the municipality and burden all the taxpayers of the city?" It states also that the mere fact of noncollection did not prove dereliction of duty. If there had been dereliction of duty, the court inquired what would be the measure of liability, as there was no guaranty of payment in the contract. The whole trend of this case is strongly against holding municipalities generally liable on such contracts. In concluding its majority opinion, the court said: "It is equally the duty of this court, as of all others, to see to it that no burden is cast upon taxpayers, citizens of a municipality, which does not spring from that which is justly and equitably a debt of the municipality, and, when a contract for local improvements is entered into, the contractor must look to the special assessments, and to them alone, for his compensation, and if they fail, without dereliction or wrong on the part of the city, neither justice nor equity will tolerate that it be charged as debtor therefor." Although the court made use of the expression

"without dereliction or wrong on the part of the city," here, in discussing the case, it nowhere appeared what the court would hold in case of such dereliction, nor what the court would deem dereliction on the part of the city. We do not take that expression as an intimation of any particular strength that such liability could be sustained, in the opinion of the court, on the ground of neglect of the city officers, for the whole trend of the argument is against it, as well as the authorities quoted. Nor is the case of Hitchcock v. Galveston, 96 U. S. 341, 24 L. ed. 659, in conflict with the foregoing, for in that case the general bonds of the city were issued not limited to the assessment fund, and the resort to lotowners upon the assessment was for the reimbursement of the city.

In 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. at § 459, it is said: "So, where the corporation orders local street improvements to be made, for which the abutters are the parties ultimately liable, and which by the charter must be made in a prescribed mode, if made without any contract or a valid one, the doctrine of implied liability does not apply in favor of the contractor, unless, indeed, the corporation has collected the amount from the adjoining owners, and has it in its treasury." And at § 482 it is said: "It has been several times decided that where the expense of making a local improvement is not to be raised by a general tax, but solely upon the property benefited, a failure of the corporation, though it is only the agent of the owners to be assessed, to discharge its duty, by making the necessary assessment, or its unreasonable delay in collecting and paying over the money, gives the contractor a right to recover his compensation in an action against the corporation. The cases on the point are conflicting. The right to a general judgment should, in our opinion, be limited, in any event, to cases where the corporation can afterwards reimburse itself by an assessment." But why should a judgment be allowed at all against the municipality, as the contractor or warrant holder has a right to proceed against the officers, or the property perhaps, and enforce the assessment? Why subject the city to the primary liability? The property in some instances might not bring enough to reimburse the city, if that is to be the controlling idea. In Elliott, Roads & Streets, at pages 436 and 487, it is said: "The doctrine that a breach of duty will render the public corporation liable to pay for an improvement which has conferred a special benefit upon a property owner has a very slender support in principle, if, indeed, it has any support at all, unless it is limited to cases where the public corporation secures and misappropriates the money collected on the assessment. It is not just to compel the citizens generally to pay for a special benefit, and this is done by taking money out of the corporate treasury to pay a local assessment. Public corporations are instrumentalities of government, and their officers are public officers with defined and limited authority; and the contractor ought to satisfy himself that the assessment can be collected from those who are benefited, and this he can do by looking into the law, and examining public records which are open to inspection. The officers who fail in their duty are not the corporation, for that is composed of the citizens of the locality, and the corporate officers are as much the representatives of the citizens specially benefited as of any of the others. If these officers fail to do their duty they can be coerced by mandate, and to this remedy the contractor should be confined, for it is far more just and reasonable to impose upon him the duty of watching the proceedings than it is to impose it upon the citizens generally, who, having no special interest in the proceedings, have a right to presume that the officers have done their duty. It is for those especially interested to secure obedience to law, and not for those who are citizens having no peculiar or special interest in the proceedings. Those only who are lacking in vigilance and diligence should suffer, and not those resting under no duty, demanding diligence and occupying no position requiring vigilance. If the money taken out of the corporate treasury to pay for the improvement came from the derelict officers alone, there would be much justice in holding the public corporation liable for their default. It does not, however, come from them, but from the citizens who constitute the governmental corporation. It is just enough to make the officers do their duty, but it is an unjustifiable burden to impose upon all the citizens the payment of money for an improvement which specially benefits specific property."

For the reasons hereinbefore stated, we have given the case before us extended attention. The question goes much beyond the interests at stake here, and hardships are bound to result, however the principles are settled. On the one hand, we have the rights of the general city taxpayer to consider. He may have paid like assessments with reference to his own property, and it is certainly a hardship to call upon him to make good a failure on the part of some other property holder to pay such an assessment, especially where the threatened burden is so excessive, in view of the high rule of property valuations prevailing in assessing for tax levies, and the liberal public debt limits allowed. In some instances it would come near the confiscation of his property. It is not a satisfactory answer to such a man to say that he must be bound by the negligence of men elected to act in a governmental capacity over a town wherein he may be residing, for it leaves him small chance of escape. Under the present civilized conditions, he is compelled to live in the society of his fellow men, and to subject himself to some form of government, and it is a hard matter to take his property away from him when he has had no direct voice in the proceedings. On the other hand, the warrant holders have parted with value for these obligations, either in performing the work where the warrants are held by the original parties, or in the amount paid for purchasing them in the case of subsequent holders. As a matter of justice, they are entitled to payment, and we have their interests to consider. Of course, if they should fail in collecting the amounts equitably due them, such failure will not be the first in the history of government, but it is desirable to make such instances as few as possible. After all that can be said and done, however, as a matter of right and law, where one of two parties must suffer, the loss should fall upon the one who has had the best opportunity to protect himself, and is the most at fault. It is apparent that if, by delay upon the part of the council to provide a special fund, the claim can become a general charge against the city, it would be directly to the interest of the warrant holder to have the proceedings delayed, in order that he might obtain the greater security, and avoid the possibility of loss through a failure of the property, or any of it, to bring the amount assessed against it, and such instances are not unheard of. It must also be borne in mind that he was a voluntary contractor, and was not put in the helpless condition of the general taxpayer outside of the district. While, perhaps, such general taxpayer might have compelled the city officers to act after the work was done, and the danger of loss to him imminent, the contractor or warrant holder had this same right, and the courts have all the time been open to him. By force of the contract, such officers should be held to be more directly his agents or representatives than the agents of the general taxpayers for the purposes of the assessment, if they were such taxpayers' agents at all in the premises. By the contract, the contractor has, in effect, adopted the machinery provided for raising his money through the acts of such officers.

From our investigation of the cases and textbooks, we are of the opinion that the decided weight of authority is against allowing a recovery of the city upon such matters at all, in the absence of an express lawful contract to that effect, or in cases where the money has been collected on the assessments, and is in the city treasury. However, it is not necessary to go that far in this case, at least at this time. But we desire to reaffirm the doctrine laid down in Stephens v. Spokane, 14 Wash. 298 and 303, that there can be no recovery of the city at all while the assessment plan can be enforced in any way; and the case of McKwan v. Spokane is in that respect overruled. No case has been presented to us so far involving the right to recover of the city where the power to enforce the assessments has been lost by lapse of time, in consequence of the negligence of the city officers or otherwise, and where it has been a mooted point, and discussed and decided, unless it is in the case of Baker v. Seattle, 2 Wash. 576, which will be further noticed. The case of Bank of British Columbia v. Port Townsend has before been sufficiently explained. Expressions bearing on this question may be found in a number of the opinions. For instance, in Stephens v. Spokane, 14 Wash. 298 and 303, in referring to Soule v. Seattle, it was said, in effect, that the city could not be liable unless it had failed to take any steps for the collection of the special fund upon which the warrants were drawn, or it had been guilty of such negligence in what it had attempted to do that the right to cause such fund to be created had been lost; and similar expressions may likely be found in other cases, which, of course, indicate that there might be a liability in such event, but go no further than an intimation. In Baker v. Seattle, 2 Wash. 576, however, somewhat the same principle seems to have been involved and decided. Like that in Paret v.

Bayonne, 40 N. J. L. 383, referred to, it was much stronger on the facts in favor of the claimants, and yet the holding was against them. It was said there, in substance, in discussing the principle, that, if the city officers failed to make the collection, it was for the unpaid claimants to compel them to proceed, and that the negligence of such officers did not place their claims in the category of the city's general indebtedness; that the claimants must look to the source provided by law for their reimbursement; that the duty laid upon the city was not the payment of the awards, but the levy and collection of the assessments. But it was intimated that the city might be liable where its officers had been fully moved to proceed, and had failed in such instances. In view of this and the subsequent expressions noticed in later decisions, we desire to regard the express point above mentioned as not definitely settled or passed upon here, except in so far as it sustains the complaint in the Port Townsend Case, alluded to, and which may have been incidentally held as the law of that case, but which case, under the circumstances given, should not have force beyond that. As the lower court in this case found that the right to proceed in enforcing the assessments was lost, and as the respondent may have attached no importance to this finding in briefing and arguing the case, in view of our holding in the McKoon Case, we feel in duty bound, considering the conflict in the cases alluded to, to allow the respondent to present it in a petition for a rehearing, if it is involved here. By taking that course, the rights of the parties can be fully considered, and, doubtless, counsel on the respective sides can further enlighten us. The great importance of the question to their clients and the public will certainly be a sufficient incentive. Then, if there is to be such an ultimate liability established, on what ground is it to be placed? Must there have been negligence on the part of the city officers in failing to provide the fund? If so, what is to constitute such negligence? Or must the right to recover be limited to cases where a general liability was expressly contracted, in harmony with the charter provisions on that subject? Or is a mere failure for any reason to provide the fund sufficient to sustain a recovery, and the city thus placed in the position of a guarantor or insurer of the success of the assessment scheme?

One further question requires some notice. It appears that the city council undertook to provide for payment of the assessments in instalments extending over a period of years. If these assessments were in substance the property of the warrant holders, it is evident that the council had no right to postpone their payment as against them, and they at all times had the right to compel the city officers to proceed diligently to collect such assessments, notwithstanding the attempt to postpone payment. The city could not thus interfere with their rights in the premises. Re Heilbron's Estate, 14 Wash. 536, 35 L. R. A. 602.

As this case now stands, the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to dismiss it; but no judgment will be entered until the time for filing a petition for a rehearing has expired, nor, of course, until the petition, if filed, is disposed of.

Dunbar, J., dissenting:

I dissent. While I have not read the most of the cases cited in the majority opinion, I am satisfied they did not involve a contract like the contract upon which this action is based. But why, say the majority, should a judgment be allowed at all against the municipality, as the contractor has a right to proceed against the officers, and enforce the assessments? Why subject the city to the primary liability? I answer, for the very best of reasons, viz., because it contracted to assume the primary liability, and the citation from the contract in the opinion shows this conclusively. It expressly covenants that it will prosecute the business of collecting this assessment without delay. It was upon this provision of the contract that the contractor, no doubt, relied. Why should the city not be compelled to respect its contracts? The essence of the whole controversy is this: A contract has been made, plain and specific in its terms. That contract has been violated by the appellant, to the injury of the respondent; and I think it a most excellent idea to compel the performance of a contract by a city, the same as by a private individual. The only other question is, Did the city have the authority to make such a contract? I think it did. The city councilmen are the agents and trustees of the taxpayers of the city, and not of the parties with whom they are contracting; and the improvements of streets, while they may be paid by local assessment, are matters which affect the interest of the whole city, and every taxpayer in the city, and are matters falling especially within the general jurisdiction of the city council. The judgment should be affirmed.

v.

(16 Wash. 36.)

Standing finish, consisting of window and door sashes, jambs, trimmings, wainscoting, baseboards, mantel piece without the tiling, and doors, including glass and hardware, when placed in a mortgaged building under a contract with the mortgagor by which the contractor retains title until he is paid, do not become a part of the real estate so as to defeat the contractor's right to remove them, when they are attached to the building by screws only, and can be removed without injury to the building.

NOTE.—For note on effect of agreement to prevent fixtures from becoming a part of the realty, see Muir v. Jones (Or.) 19 L. R. A. 441.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County in favor of defendants in an action brought to determine the right of defendants to certain fixtures which had been affixed to a building under an agreement that they might be removed. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Cyrus Happy, for appellant:

Whether an agreement shall preserve the character of personality in things so affixed to the freehold, as that but for such agreement they would become part of the realty, depends upon their essential character and the mode in which they are annexed, e. g., whether they can be removed without serious damage to the freehold or substantially destroying their own qualities and value.

Ewell, Fixtures, 68.

Can it be said in this case that the banking building would not be seriously damaged by tearing all the doors, both inside and out, from their hinges; all the windows from their casings; tearing to pieces all the window frames and casings, door casings and door jambs and trimmings, leaving nothing but the rough ragged edges of the building (stone or brick); by removing the wainscoting and baseboards from the walls, leaving the rough brick between the floor and the plastering which extends only to the top of the wainscoting?

Ford v. Cobb, 20 N. Y. 348; Voorhees v. McGinnis, 48 N. Y. 287.

Even if it is possible for a mortgagor or materialman by agreement or fiat, as between themselves, to so vaccinate with personality attributes the material about to be wrought into a building that it will not catch the real estate after it has become a part and parcel of it, this wonderful power cannot affect the mortgagee without his consent.

Messrs. Forster & Wakefield and Everett C. Ellis, for respondents:

The law of fixtures is in derogation of the original rule of common law, which subjected everything affixed to the freehold to the law governing the freehold; and it has grown up into a system of judicial legislation, so as almost to render the right of removal of fixtures a general rule instead of being an exception.

2 Kent, Com. 7th ed. 402; Dubois v. Kelly, 10 Barb. 496.

Three tests have been employed in determining what is a fixture, viz.: (1) Real or constructive annexation of the article in question to the realty; (2) appropriation or adaptation to the use or purpose of that part of the realty with which it is connected; (3) the intention of the party making the annexation to make the article a permanent accession to the freehold.

Cox*, 24 N. J. L. 287; Sampson v. Graham, 96 Pa. 406; Smith v. Waggoner, 50 Wis. 155.

As between the parties an agreement that a chattel shall remain personality is conclusive.

This depends, however, upon whether they can be removed without serious damage to the freehold or substantially destroying their own qualities and values.

Can it be held that in this case the character of the chattels is such that personality cannot be predicated of them.

Can the real-estate mortgagee, whose mortgage was obtained before any building was erected on the mortgaged land by the mortgagor, claim that chattels are covered by his real-estate mortgage, which chattels were originally personal in their nature, were put in after the building was completed, affixed to the building in a very slight manner only concerning which chattels the vendor and mortgagor have made a written agreement before they were annexed, that they should remain personal property, which chattels can be removed without injury to themselves, and which the mortgagee expressly stipulates can be removed without injury to the realty. This proposition must be answered in the negative.

Dunbar, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is submitted upon an agreed statement of facts. The facts were about as follows: That on the 27th day of May, 1892, A. M. Cannon and Jennie F. Cannon, his wife, who were the owners in fee simple of certain lots in Spokane Falls, for a valuable consideration executed and delivered to the plaintiff (appellant herein), the German Savings & Loan Society, a mortgage upon said lots, together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereunto belonging or in any wise appertaining. This mortgage was duly recorded on the 2d day of June, 1892, and none of the indebtedness for which it has been given has been paid. That upon a portion of said lots, Cannon and wife erected a building for the purpose of carrying on a banking business. That said building has never been occupied, but that said Cannon contracted with the respondents C. F. Weber & Co., to put in said building what is known as the "standing finish," consisting of window and door sashes, jambs, and trimmings, wainscoting, entrance doors, side door, two small doors in rear, including glass and hardware, baseboards and wainscoting, mantel piece with-out tiling and footings,—in all amounting to $3,667.82. That in pursuance of said contract said C. F. Weber & Co. manufactured and shipped to Spokane said standing finish, and that they then learned that said Cannon was unable to pay for the same; and thereupon the said Cannon and his wife entered into an agreement on the 1st day of July, 1893, with the said C. F. Weber & Co., to the effect, in brief, that C. F. Weber & Co. should retain possession of said property and said buildings, as aforesaid, until they were fully paid for according to the terms of their contract, or until other arrangements were made, satisfactory to the said C. F. Weber & Co., and in the meantime the ownership and possession of said property were to remain with the said C. F. Weber & Co. That under said agreement, C. F. Weber & Co. placed their said property in the bank building. That the glass had been put in the sash, and the sash put in the windows. That the jambs and trimmings had been fastened to the building by screws, and the wainscoting and other finish had been fastened to the building by screws, the wainscoting being screwed to a furring strip running horizontally around the said building at the top of the wainscoting. That the room was only plastered down to the top of the wainscoting, and behind the wainscoting, baseboards, etc., was plain brick. And the agreement further provides that all of said property described in said Exhibit C could be removed without damage or injury to the building other than the loss to the realty, if it should be determined that it is such a part of the realty that the said parties would have no right to remove it. It is the contention of the respondents that C. F. Weber & Co., under the terms of the contract, have the right to remove said property, as shown in Exhibit C, referred to above, by leaving the building in substantially the same condition that it was in before the said property was placed in said building; and the German Savings & Loan Society (the appellant here) claims that said property has become a part of the realty, that it is covered by its mortgage, and that the said parties have no right to remove it. The judgment of the court was in favor of C. F. Weber & Co., and from such judgment an appeal is taken to this court.

The history of litigation on the subject of fixtures and annexations is to the effect that it has always been considered largely a mixed question of law and of fact, depending upon the relations of the parties, the character of the fixtures, and the manner of the annexation, very largely in each particular case. It cannot be denied, however, that the old common law in relation to fixtures, being construed as a part of the realty, has been greatly modified in modern times by reason of the changing conditions of trade, and for the purpose of protecting traffic in building fixtures. The contention of the appellant in this case is twofold: First, that, as between the parties to this contract, the goods supplied here became a part of the real estate, and that they had no right to stipulate or agree that real estate was personal property, and that such agreement could not be carried into effect by the court; and, second, that, even conceding the efficacy of such an agreement between the parties, the mortgagee in this case could not be bound by the agreement, and consequently his rights would not be affected thereby, and that the question of intention could not be made to apply against his interests. We are satisfied that the trend of modern authority is to the effect that the intention of the contracting parties should be allowed to control; and that intention will control, even so far as the rights of the former mortgage is concerned, subject to the limitation that the fixtures which, outside of stipulation, would have, under the law, been regarded as real estate, can be removed only when such removal can be effected without injury to the real estate or to the building to which they are attached. We think this is the almost unbroken current of modern authority, and is even borne out by most of the cases cited by the appellant. The appellant, on page 10 of his brief, cites the following from Mr. Ewell in his work on Fixtures (p. 68): "A limitation to the rights of the parties to change, by their agreements, the status of property from that which the law would assign to it in the absence of a special agreement, has, however, been made in some cases, and the rule has been stated to be, that whether an agreement shall preserve the character of personality in things so affixed to the freehold, as that, but for such agreement, they would become part of the realty, depends upon their essential character, and the mode in which they are annexed: e. g., whether they can be removed without serious damage to the freehold, or substantially destroying their own qualities and value." Applying this test to the case at bar, it does not appear that any damage would be done to the freehold by the removal of these fixtures,—in fact, it is stipulated that no damage would be done other than loss to the realty of the value of the fixtures,—and they are of such a nature that it seems to us that their value would not be destroyed as merchandise. Therefore, the rights of the mortgagee have not been deleteriously affected by the removal of these fixtures, for the building upon which his lien attached has lost nothing in value, and his security has been in no way affected by reason of the entering into this contract between his mortgagor and C. F. Weber & Co. This limitation to contract with reference to fixtures, is even severely criticised by Mr. Ewell in the section above referred to, excepting where it affects the rights of third parties. The author, continuing, says: "Where the rights of third parties intervene, the propriety and necessity of such a limitation will be very readily conceded; but, as between the immediate parties to the agreement, the limitation seems, to say the least, sufficiently strict: and where, as in the case of a house, the materials might be of value after severance, no more reason is perceived why such an agreement should not be effectual as between the parties, than in the case of a fixture that might be removed uninjured, the difference between the two cases being, not one of principle, but simply degree, one of more or less." Mr. Ewell, to sustain this proposition, cites the case of Ford v. Cobb, 20 N. Y. 344, also cited by the appellant in this case, where Judge Denio, in rendering the opinion for the court, said: "It will readily be conceded that the ordinary distinction between real estate and chattels exists in the nature of the subject, and cannot, in general, be changed by the convention of the parties. Thus, it would not be competent for parties to create a personal chattel interest in a part of the separate bricks, beams, or other materials of which the walls of a house were composed." Of course it would not, for under such circumstances the realty would be more or less injured or destroyed; and the court in that case proceeds to verify this idea, for it says: "Thus, a house or other building, which, from its size, or the materials of which it was constructed, or the manner in which it was fixed to the land, could not be removed without practically destroying it, would not, I conceive, become a mere chattel, by means of any agreement which could be made concerning it. So of the separate materials of a building, and things fixed into the wall, so as to be essential to its support; it is impossible that they should, by any arrangement between the owners, become chattels." But the court emphasizes the test which we have above referred to by proceeding to say: "But it is otherwise with things which, being originally personal in their nature, are attached to the realty in such a manner that they may be detached without being destroyed or materially injured, and without the destruction of, or material injury to, the things real with which they are connected; though their connection with the land or other real estate is such that, in the absence of an agreement or of any special relation between the parties in interest, they would be a part of the real estate." And that court cited approvingly Fryatt v. Sullivan Co. 5 Hill, 116, stating that that case was decided upon this distinction. That case was where a certain steam boiler and engine were leased, and the lessees took them and affixed them so firmly to the freehold that they could not be removed without destroying the building in which they were placed. The case of Ford v. Cobb, 20 N. Y. 344, is in point in all particulars, for there, as here, the right of a prior conveyancer was brought in question. Binkley v. Forkner, 19 N. E. 755 [117 Ind. 176, 8 L. R. A. 38], is a well considered case, and there it was held that "where one purchasing machinery gives a chattel mortgage for its price, and orally agrees that it shall be treated as personalty until paid for, and the realty to which it is afterwards attached by him will not be injured by its removal, the machinery will be considered as personal property, as against a prior mortgagee of the realty." And the cases relied upon by the appellant in this case are distinguished in that case. Thus, where the case of Campbell v. Roddy, 44 N. J. Eq. 244, is quoted, the court made use of the following language: "Thus, if, in the course of constructing a house, brick should be placed in the walls, and joists and beams in their proper places, the brickmaker and sawyer would not be permitted to despoil the house by asserting an agreement with the owner that the brick and beams were to retain their character as personalty notwithstanding their annexation." After citing cases, the court goes on to say: "But when chattels are of such a character as to retain their identity and distinctive characteristics after the annexation, and do not thereby become an essential part of the building, so that the removal of the chattels will not materially injure the building, nor destroy or unnecessarily impair the value of the chattels, a mutual agreement in respect to the manner in which the chattes shall be regarded after annexation will have the effect to preserve the personal character of the property between the parties to the agreement." It was held there that "a prior mortgagee cannot occupy the attitude of an innocent purchaser. The interests and rights of the holder of a chattel mortgage upon property which is annexed to real estate upon which there is an existing mortgage must be determined by the practical application of equitable principles to the rights of the respective parties. Whether the chattel mortgage shall be postponed, notwithstanding the agreement between the owner of the land and the mortgagee, must depend upon the inquiry whether or not the preservation of the rights of the holder of the chattel mortgage will impair or diminish the security of the real-estate mortgagee as it was when he took it. If it will not, then it would be inequitable that the latter should defeat or destroy the security of the former. If it will, then it was the folly or misfortune of the holder of the chattel mortgage that he permitted the property to be annexed to a freehold from which it cannot be removed without diminution ing or impairing an existing mortgage thereon." This is only announcing the rule which we announced at the outset,—that an agreement by which fixtures should be considered personal property can be carried into effect if the removal of the same could be effected without injuring the real estate, or, applying it to this case, without diminishing the security of the mortgagee. In Tift v. Horton, 53 N. Y. 377, 18 Am. Rep. 537, it was held: "Where chattels are annexed to real estate with the intent that they shall not thereby become part of the freehold, as a general rule the intent will control; to preserve their character as personalty, a concurrent intent, on the part of a prior mortgagee of the real estate, is not necessary; and neither a prior nor subsequent mortgagee of the lands can claim, as subject to the lien of his mortgage, chattels brought upon and affixed to the lands under an agreement between the owner of the fee and the owner of the chattels that the character of the latter as personal property is not to be changed, and that they are subject to a right of the owner to remove them." This case squarely decides all the points that there are raised in the case at bar. It is a well considered case, and has been cited by nearly all the cases that have been adjudicated on this subject since its decision. We think it announces the overwhelming weight of authority that the security of the appellant in this case has not been diminished by the agreement which was entered into and executed by the mortgagor and the respondents C. F. Weber & Co., and that there is no reason which can be sustained by either legal or equitable principles why the respondents in this case should not have the benefit of the contract which they made with the Cannons.

The judgment will be affirmed.

NOTE.—On the question what is to be considered machinery within the meaning of an insurance policy the above case seems to have fully reviewed the authorities.

Statement by Taft, Circuit Judge:

The action below was brought by N. K. Fairbank & Co. against the Cincinnati, New Orleans, & Texas Pacific Railway Company to recover damages for the loss of four tanks of oil alleged to have been destroyed while in transportation over the defendant's railroad. On May 4, 1889, the Southern Cotton-Oil Company shipped from Atlanta, Georgia, consigned to N. K. Fairbank & Co., at Chicago, Illinois, five tank cars loaded with cotton-seed oil. All of them were shipped under bills of lading of the same form issued by the East Tennessee, Virginia, & Georgia Railway Company, providing that they should be carried over the East Tennessee, Virginia, & Georgia Railway, the Cincinnati, New Orleans, & Texas Pacific Railway, and other roads. The bills of lading provided that the oil should be carried by "the East Tennessee, Virginia, & Georgia Railway to, . . . thence by connecting rail or other carrier via, . . . until they reached the station or wharf nearest their destination." The bill of lading contained the following provisions which have a bearing in this case: "It is mutually agreed, in consideration of the rates herein guaranteed, that the liability of each carrier, as to goods destined beyond its own route, shall be terminated by proper delivery of them to the next succeeding carrier. No carrier, or the property of any, shall be liable for . . . nor for any loss or damage arising from any of the following causes, viz.: Fire from any cause, on land or water, or while awaiting shipment, transshipment, or delivery, or during transportation; jettison; ice; freshets; floods; weather; pirates, robbers, or thieves; acts of God or of the country's enemies; riots, strikes, mobs, or combinations; collisions; explosions; accidents to boilers or machinery; stranding; straining; any accident on or perils of the seas or other waters, or of steam or inland navigation; restraints of government; legal process; claims of ownership by third parties; detention or accidental delay; want of proper coöperage or mending; insufficiency of package in strength or otherwise; rust; dampness; loss of weight; leakage; breakage; sweat; blowing; bursting of casks or packages from weakness or natural causes; evaporation; vermin; frost; heat; smell; contact with or proximity to other goods; natural decay or exposure to weather; nor for the condition of baling of hay, hemp, or cotton or country damage to cotton, or for loss or damage of any kind on goods whose bulk or nature requires them to be carried on open cars or on deck, or for the condition of packages or any deficiency in the contents thereof if receipted for by consignees as in good order." The bill of lading contained this further provision: "This bill of lading is signed for the different carriers who may be engaged in the transportation, severally, not jointly, and each of them is to be bound by, and have the benefit of, all the provisions thereof as if signed by it, the shipper, owner, and assignee." The cars, after being loaded, were hauled to Chattanooga, and were delivered to the defendant company on May 6. At about 2 o'clock on the morning of May 7 the train containing these cars was wrecked on the defendant's line, and four of the tank cars were so damaged that the oil contained therein was totally lost. The market value of the lost oil at the time was agreed to be $5,270.53. This suit was brought to recover this amount. The third defense of the answer set up the conditions in the bill of lading heretofore stated, and averred that the loss of the oil was solely due to an accident to certain machinery, to wit, the axle of a car in defendant's train in which said four tanks of oil were being transported, which axle, without any fault or negligence on the part of this defendant, failed and broke down, under said car, whereby said four cars, being in the rear thereof, were derailed, and the contents thereof were lost. The case was twice tried. In the first trial the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff. The trial court was of opinion that it had erred in directing a verdict for plaintiff, and on motion granted a new trial. In the second trial the court directed a verdict for the defendant, and entered judgment upon the verdict. This writ of error is prosecuted to reverse the judgment. At the trial, there was no evidence tending to show that defendant was guilty of a want of care in the matter of the axle. It broke because of an internal defect in the material which external examination could not have discovered.

Messrs. Ramsey, Maxwell, & Ramsey, for plaintiff in error:

A car axle is not machinery within the meaning of the bill of lading.

Hutchinson, Carr. § 275; Gleadell v. Thomson, 56 N. Y. 198; Hawkins v. Great Western R. Co. 17 Mich. 57, 97 Am. Dec. 179.

Exceptions in a bill of lading are to be construed most strongly against the shipowner; and when they form, in the contract, part of long enumerations of excepted causes of damage, all the rest of which relate to matters subsequent to the beginning of the voyage, they must be treated as equally limited in their scope.

The Caledonia, 157 U. S. 124, 39 L. ed. 644.

Even if the word be held to relate to the machinery employed in transportation by rail as well as by sea, it can have but one meaning in both cases, viz.: machinery used for generating and distributing propelling power through the agency of steam.

Porter, Bills of Lading, § 203.

The breaking of an axle solely on account of its defective condition, and without any external provoking cause, is not an accident within the meaning of these bills.

The Glenfruin, L. R. 10 Prob. Div. 103; Tattersall v. National S. S. Co. 12 Q. B. Div. 297; The Caledonia, 157 U. S. 124, 39 L. ed. 645; Hawkins v. Great Western R. Co. 17 Mich. 57, 97 Am. Dec. 179; Talcott v. Commercial Ins. Co. 2 Johns. 124, 3 Am. Dec. 406; Work v. Leathers, 97 U. S. 379, 24 L. ed. 1012; Kopitoff v. Wilson, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 377; Steel v. State Line S. S. Co. L. R. 3 App. Cas. 72; The Rover, 38 Fed. Rep. 616; Chadwick v. Deniston, 41 Fed. Rep. 58; De Rothschild v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Co. 7 Exch. 784; Cream City R. Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 63 Wis. 98, 53 Am. Rep. 267.

Was not the breaking of the axle merely a link in the chain of causation, the proximate and efficient moving cause being the defect? Was the breaking of this axle any more the cause of the loss than the breaking of the tank valves through which the oil escaped?

Clyde v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 59 Fed. Rep. 394; Ransier v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 33 Minn. 381; Lilly v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 107 N. Y. 566; Waldhier v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 87 Mo. 37.

The common-law liability of the carrier with reference to defective cars for transportation by rail is not different from that of the shipowner with reference to his obligation to furnish a seaworthy vessel.

Story, Bailm. §§ 509, 571a, 592; Alden v. New York C. R. Co. 26 N. Y. 102, 82 Am. Dec. 401; Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Searles, 71 Miss. 744; Sharp v. Grey, 9 Bing. 457; Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co. v. Burke, 13 Wend. 611, 28 Am. Dec. 438; 8 Wood, Railway Law, p. 1898, § 430.

Messrs. Judson Harmon, Edward Colston, A. W. Goldsmith, and George Hoadly, Jr., for defendant in error:

There are no authorities holding that an axle may not be machinery in this case, while the few authorities there are which give a definition of the word "machinery" in its legal import are all in favor of the view that an axle is machinery.

Seavey v. Central Mut. F. Ins. Co. 111 Mass. 540; Louber v. Le Roy, 2 Sandf. 202; Com. v. Lowell Gaslight Co. 12 Allen, 75; Georgia P. R. Co. v. Brooks, 84 Ala. 140; Benedict v. New Orleans, 44 La. Ann. 798.

Having shown that the accident was due to the breaking of an axle, and having shown that this axle was machinery, its breaking would appear to be an accident to machinery.

The burden of proof of negligence is on the plaintiff, and the plaintiff has not merely not established that there was negligence, but the defendant has affirmatively established that there was none.

Taft, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The learned judge of the circuit, finding from the undisputed evidence that the loss of the oil had been occasioned by the breaking of an axle, held that such a cause was an accident to machinery, within the exemption of the bill of lading, and so directed a verdict for the defendant. The construction thus put upon the exemption in the bill of lading presents the only question which we deem it necessary to consider. It is well settled that exemptions in favor of a common carrier in bills of lading are to be strictly construed against the carrier, and that any doubt or ambiguity therein is to be resolved in favor of the shipper. Black v. Goodrich Transp. Co. 55 Wis. 319, 42 Am. Rep. 718; Little Rock, M. R. & T. R. Co. v. Talbot, 39 Ark. 524; Norman v. Binnington, L. R. 25 Q. B. Div. 475, 477; Taylor v. Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. L. R. 9 Q. B. 546, 549; Burton v. English, L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 218, 224; Cream City R. Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 68 Wis. 98, 53 Am. Rep. 267. "And when the particular dangers or risks against which the carrier has specifically guarded himself in this receipt are followed by more general and comprehensive words of exemption, the latter are to be construed to embrace only occurrences ejusdem generis with those previously enumerated, unless there be a clear intent to the contrary. Hutchinson, Carr. 2d ed. §§ 275, 276; Hawkins v. Great Western R. Co. 17 Mich. 57, 97 Am. Dec. 179; The Caledonia, 157 U. S. 124, 39 L. ed. 644. It is perfectly manifest from a reading of a bill of lading and the exemption thereof that the bill was designed as a contract for both land and water transportation, for the clause runs: "Fire from any cause, on land and water, or while awaiting shipment, transshipment, or delivery, or during transportation; jettison; ice; freshets; floods; weather; pirates, robbers, or thieves; acts of God or the country's enemies; riots, strikes, mobs, or combinations; collisions; explosions; accidents to boilers or machinery; stranding; straining; any accident on or perils of the seas or other waters, or of steam or inland navigation," etc.

Light is thrown upon the meaning of the phrase "accidents to boiler and machinery" if we consider it as applied to a ship as well as to a freight train. The juxtaposition of the words "boiler" and "machinery" certainly suggests that machinery refers to the group of mechanical parts connected with the boiler and steam supply by which power is generated and applied, and the vessel is propelled through the water. And the term must have the same limitations when applied to a train of cars. In this light, "machinery" only includes the mechanical instrumentalities present in the engine room of the steamer or the locomotive of the train. The cars and their appurtenances are the things which are being moved or drawn by the machinery. Parts of the car are not, in our opinion, in the common acceptance of the term, embraced within the term "machinery," especially when that is associated with the term "boilers." It is true, it may be difficult to draw the line as to certain devices used upon the cars which are directly connected with the engine, as, for instance, the appliances necessary to the operation of the Westinghouse air brake. These are directly connected with the engine, and yet are a permanent part of the car. But, while doubtful cases may be suggested, we are very clear in our opinion that those devices and parts of a car which have no physical operation and connection with the locomotive except by means of the cars of the train and the couplers between them are not within the meaning of the term "machinery" in the phrase "accidents to boilers and machinery," any more than the plates on the hull of a steamship can be said to be part of its machinery. The wheels and axle are necessary to the movement of the car, just as the hull and plates on the ship are necessary to its progress through the water; and in a wide sense they are a part of the machinery necessary to render the transportation of the train or ship possible. But they certainly would not be so construed except in cases where the most liberal rule of construction is to prevail. There is very little authority upon this question, although the form of the bill of lading herein seems to have been a very old one.

In Porter on the Law of Bills of Lading (§ 203) it is said that "the phrase 'damage from machinery' will not cover a loss caused by the breaking of tackle used to discharge cargo. The word 'machinery,' it has been said, includes only the machinery by which the vessel is propelled." In support of this, the author cites The Galley of Lorne, 31 Mitchell's Mar. Reg. 188, and Leggett, Bills of Lading, p. 179.

We do not think that the cases cited by the counsel for the appellee, and which were relied on by the learned judge at the circuit, support the conclusion reached, because in them the term was used with reference to a subject-matter quite different from that in the case at bar. In Georgia P. R. Co. v. Brooks, 84 Ala. 138, the question was whether an injury in the eye, received by a railroad employee, caused by a scale flying from the iron rail of the track when struck with a defective hammer, was not an injury caused by reason of a defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the master or employer, and so within the statute to define the liabilities of employers or workmen for injuries received by the workmen while in the service of the employer. The court held that the hammer was not a part of the machinery within the statute, but in the course of the discussion it gave a wide definition to the term "machinery,"—a definition certainly wide enough to include the axles of cars in a train. The judge said: "In construing words used in a statute, reference should be made to the subject of legislation, and if they have acquired a defined, popular signification when referable to such subject, the presumption is that they were used in such sense by the legislature. A machine is a piece of mechanism, which, whether simple or compound, acts by a combination of mechanical parts, which serve to create or apply power to produce motion, or to increase or regulate the effect. As used in the patent act, it has been defined to be 'a concrete thing, consisting of parts, or of certain devices or combination of devices.' Burr v. Duryee, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 581, 17 L. ed. 650. Primarily, machinery means the works of a machine,—the combination of the several parts to put it in motion. But we do not understand that the term was used in the statute in its primary sense, but, having a more enlarged signification, should be construed as so used, nothing appearing to show that it was intended to be used in its primary or restricted sense. Thus understood, the term 'machinery' embraces all the parts and instruments intended to be and actually operated from time to time exclusively by force created and applied by mechanical apparatus or contrivance, though the initial force may be produced by the muscular strength of men or animals, or by water or steam, or other inanimate agency. Seavey v. Central Mut. F. Ins. Co. 111 Mass. 540. The carding, spinning, and weaving machines, together with the instrumentality by which the prime motive power is created or applied, constitute the machinery of a cotton mill. When cars, though used at times, and at other times detached, are formed into a train, to which the propelling force is imparted by means of a locomotive, the entire train constitutes machinery connected with or used in the business."

The association of the word "machinery" with the words "ways and plants" was quite enough to justify the court in giving the term an enlarged signification in the case cited, but the reasoning of the court shows that in a case where the rule of construction is a narrow one the term would not embrace either the car body, car wheels, or the car axles, but only that combination of mechanical parts connected with the locomotive and boiler for the propelling of the train

In the case of Seavey v. Central Mut. F. Ins. Co. 111 Mass. 540, the question was of the construction of a contract of insurance in which the property insured was described as "the engine and machinery contained in a two-story frame building for the manufacture of tinware," etc. The issue was whether this language included 642 forming and cutting machines, which were dies made of iron or steel, and used to give form to the various utensils made in the business. These dies were capable of being removed from the press, and others were substituted in their place as often as the product of manufacture was to be varied. It was decided that in such a policy the word "machinery" might fairly be held to cover all the implements intended to be operated by the machinery in the business of the insured, and which were usually operated in the regular and ordinary prosecution of the business described in the policy. It will be observed that in this case the rule of construction was favorable to the assured, and that the words "for the manufacture of tinware" justified a broad interpretation of the word "machinery."

In Com. v. Lowell Gaslight Co. 12 Allen, 75, the question was whether, under a tax law which imposed taxation upon the market value of the capital stock of the gas company, but permitted this amount to be reduced by deducting the value of the real estate and machinery for which the corporation was assessed in the town or city in which it was established and carried on its business, the mains or pipes laid down in the streets to distribute the gas, and the gas meters were to be regarded as machinery of the corporation; and it was held that they were, the court saying: "Indeed, in a broad, comprehensive, and legitimate sense, the entire apparatus by which gas is manufactured and distributed for consumption throughout a city or town constitutes one great integral machine, consisting of retorts, station meters, gas holders, street mains, service pipes, and consumers' meters, all connected and operating together, by means of which the initial, intermediate, and final processes are carried on from its generation in the retort to its delivery for the use of the consumers."

It is hardly necessary to point out that the almost figurative sense in which the term "machinery" is here used in favor of the taxpayer, and to support a reasonable construction of the statute, can have no application to the case at bar in which the word "machinery" is to be given a specific and restricted meaning.

Our conclusion upon this point renders it unnecessary for us to consider the remaining argument pressed upon us by counsel for the plaintiff, to wit, that a common carrier by train is held to an implied warranty of the sound condition of the cars in which the merchandise transported is carried, analogous to the implied warranty of seaworthiness to which the common carrier by sea is held, and that in such cases the exception as to accidents from machinery in the bill of lading applies only to accidents after the transportation has begun, and does not include those which arise from defects, though hidden, if in existence before shipment commences.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, with directions to order a new trial

PENNSYLVANIA, SUPREME COURT.

Re Vacation of a Portion of MELON STREET in the City of Philadelphia.

APPEALS by Jacob L. STADELMAN, William H. BOWER, Sarah Ann EDDOWES et al., Caroline LEVERING et al., and Harriet PERKINS.

(188 Pa. 397.)

Owners of property abutting on that portion of a street which is not vacated, but which is left a cul de sac by vacating another part of the street, if the market value of the property is lessened thereby, are entitled to damages under act April 21, 1858, § 6, giving the owner of land injured by the vacation of a street the same right to damages as if it was injured by the opening or widening of a street.

(October 11, 1897.)

A PPPEALS by petitioners from a judgment of the Superior Court reversing judgments of the Court of Quarter Sessions for Philadelphia County which confirmed the report of viewers assessing damages for injuries to petitioners because of the vacation of a portion of a street. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Following is the opinion of the superior court by WILLARD, J.:

The first, tenth, and twelfth assignments of error raise the question squarely whether the proceedings in the court below were properly instituted under the provisions of the 6th section of the act of April 21, 1858.

The contention of the appellant is that the court of quarter sessions of the county of Philadelphia was without jurisdiction in the premises, and this involves the question whether the act of April 21, 1858, has been repealed or not. The appellant claims that by the provisions of the act of May 8, 1889, and of May 16, 1891, the act of April 21, 1858, was repealed. This leads us to a consideration, first, of the act of May 16, 1891. At the time this act was passed extensive municipal improvements had been commenced and were in process of construction in the city of Pittsburgh, under the provisions of the act of June 14, 1887. By a decision of the supreme court that act was declared unconstitutional (Engel's Appeal, 187 Pa. 494), and the city of Pittsburgh was powerless to collect assessments for work completed or to prosecute other contemplated municipal improvements. On May 16, 1891, three acts of assembly were approved, one of them entitled "An Act to Authorize the Ascertainment, Levy, Assessment, and Collection of the Costs and Damages and Expenses of Municipal Improvements, Including Grading, Paving, Macadamizing, or Otherwise Improving of Any Street, Lane, or Alley, or Part Thereof, Completed or in Process of Completion; and also the Costs, Damages, and Expenses of the Construction of Any Sewer Completed or now in Process of Completion, and Authorizing the Completion of Any Such Improvement." Pub. Laws 1891, p. 71. The second act is entitled "An Act in Relation to the Laying Out, Opening, Widening, Straightening, Extending, or Vacating Streets and Alleys and the Construction of Bridges in the Several Municipalities of This Commonwealth; the Grading, Paving, Macadamizing, or Otherwise Improving Streets and Alleys; Providing for Ascertaining the Damages to Private Property Resulting Therefrom, the Assessment of the Damages, Costs, and Expenses Thereof upon the Property Benefitted, and the Construction of Sewers and Payment of the Damages, Costs, and Expenses Thereof, Including Damages to Private Property Resulting Therefrom." Pub. Laws 1891, p. 75. The third of these acts (Pub. Laws 1891, p. 80), is an act repealing fifteen special or local acts relative to streets, alleys, bridges, sewers, etc., in the city of Pittsburgh.

The second of these acts, as its title indicates, provided a code for every municipality in the commonwealth relative to opening, widening, straightening, extending, or vacating streets and alleys. It provides for the presentation of petitions by the proper parties to the courts of common pleas of the proper county, and for the appointment of three freeholders as viewers. By the 9th section of said act it is provided that municipal corporations shall have power to open, widen, straighten, or extend streets or alleys, and to vacate the same, upon petition of a majority in number and interest of owners of property abutting on the line of the proposed improvement. In connection with the other two acts above cited, approved at the same time, it is evident that these acts were passed for the relief of the city of Pittsburgh in view of the unconstitutional legislation under which municipal improvements had been made, and which at the time of the passage of these acts were stayed for want of appropriate and adequate legislative authority. The act of May 16, 1891, Pub. Laws, 71, was passed to remedy and provide for the mischief done under the provisions of the act of June 14, 1887, declared unconstitutional. The act of May 16, 1891, Pub. Laws, 80, repeals certain acts and parts of acts concerning streets and sewers in the city of Pittsburgh. These acts and parts of acts, as above stated, were fifteen in number, and were applicable to the city of Pittsburgh. It was thus clearly indicated by the legislature that no special or local act was intended to be repealed by the act of May 16, 1891, Pub. Laws, 75, except the acts and parts of acts mentioned in the repealing act above cited. Said act contains no repealing clause. The act approved May 8, 1889, Pub. Laws, 129, entitled "An Act Fixing the Number of Road and Bridge Viewers," whether intended to apply to country or city, contains this express exception: "This act shall not apply to counties having local acts inconsistent herewith."

If the act of April 21, 1858, is a special or local act, then the act of May 16, 1891, above cited, did not repeal its provisions, as a general statute without negative words will not repeal a previous local statute, even though the provisions of both are inconsistent with each other.

The question, then, of jurisdiction hinges upon whether the act of April 21, 1858, is a special or local act. That act is entitled "A Further Supplement to the Act Incorporating the City of Philadelphia." The 6th section of the act pertains to the question we are considering, and is here inserted:

"Sec. 6. That it shall be the duty of juries selected to assess damages for the opening, widening, or vacating roads or streets within the said city, to ascertain and report to the court: First, what damages the parties claiming the same are entitled to; and, second, to assess and apportion the same among and against such owners of land as shall be benefited by such opening, widening, or vacating any such road or street; and when such report shall be affirmed by the court, upon notice to all such parties, and the damages paid or secured by the parties among and against whom it shall be so assessed and apportioned, the chief commissioner of highways shall proceed to open, widen, or vacate such road or street accordingly: Provided, however, That it shall be lawful for councils, when, in their judgment the public interests shall require it, to provide for the payment of such damages out of the city treasury: And further provided, That two thirds of the members of each branch of councils present at the passage of such ordinance consent thereto and the yeas and nays on the passage thereof shall be entered on the journals."

That this section applies only to the city of Philadelphia is too plain for argument. The act of April 1, 1864, Pub. Laws, 206, entitled "An Act Relating to the Opening of Streets and Payment of Damages Therefor in the City of Philadelphia," while it provides a new method of assessing damages for the opening of streets, in no way modifies or repeals that part of the act of April 21, 1858, as to vacation. As to the mode of appointing viewers under the act of June 13, 1836, Pub. Laws, 566, the 76th, 77th, 78th, 79th, 80th, and 81st sections of said act provide a peculiar method of selecting viewers in the city of Philadelphia. By the provisions of the act of March 16, 1866, Pub. Laws, 224, the above-quoted sections were expressly repealed, together with the proviso to the 1st section of said act, and in lieu thereof it was enacted as follows: "And hereafter, in all cases relating to the opening of streets upon the plans of the city of Philadelphia, and of view, review, and assessment of damages for and in relation to roads, bridges, or property otherwise taken for public use, the persons appointed to view, review, and assess all damages shall be appointed by the court of quarter sessions of the county of Philadelphia, in the same manner with the same qualifications, and to have the like powers and perform the like duties, as is provided by the general laws of this commonwealth." The 6th section of the act of April 21, 1858, in connection with the act of March 16, 1866, provided a system for the vacation of streets peculiar to the city of Philadelphia; a system perfect in its operation, local in its application, and as such has been resorted to from the date of its 38 L. R. A.

passage in all proceedings for the vacation of streets in the city for which it was intended. That the 6th section of the act of 1858 was in full force and operation before the passage of the acts of 1869 and 1891 above referred to was fully settled by Mr. Justice Mitchell, in Vacation of Howard Street, 142 Pa. 601. As it is perfectly clear that the act of 1858 is a local and special act, so far as it provides for the assessment of damages and benefits in the vacation of streets and proceedings for that purpose, the act is not repealed, and the court of quarter sessions of Philadelphia had full jurisdiction of the proceedings in that court. Therefore it follows that the first, tenth, and twelfth assignments of error must be overruled.

The second, third, fourth, ninth, and eleventh assignments of error raise the principal question in this case. The appellant's case is founded upon exceptions to the report of the jury of view. The first exception filed in the court below is as follows:

"1. Because it appears by the said report that none of the claimants to whom damages are awarded by the said report is the owner of property abutting upon the portion of Melon street vacated."

This exception goes to the very root of the controversy. The first duty imposed upon the jury of view by the act of assembly, under the provisions of which they were acting was "to ascertain and report to the court, first, what damages the parties claiming the same are entitled to."

Our first duty in considering this question is to inquire whether the parties claiming are entitled to any damage. On a careful examination of the record we find that Melon street from the west side of Ninth street to Ridge avenue had been for many years (prior to its partial vacation) a public highway and street. That the councils of Philadelphia, by ordinance duly approved on July 14, 1891, revised that portion of the city plan of streets comprised between Ninth, Tenth, and Wallace streets, and Fairmount avenue, in the Thirtieth ward of the city of Philadelphia, by striking therefrom that portion of Melon street lying between the west line of Ninth street and a point 132 feet 14 inches west thereof on the south side of Melon street, and a point 122 feet 64 inches west of Ninth street on the north side of Melon street. It further appears that the properties of all the parties to whom damages were awarded did not abut on the part of Melon street vacated, but commenced at the point of vacation, extending westward toward Tenth street from No. 912 to 924 on the south side of Melon street, and from 913 to 925 on the north side of said street, Nos. 913 and 913 being nearest to the vacated portion and Nos. 924 and 925 most distant therefrom. It further appears from the viewers' report that before the vacation complained of Melon street was an open public highway from Ridge avenue to the west side of Ninth street between Fairmount avenue and Green street, in the city of Philadelphia. It further appears, from the revised plan referred to in the petition and report of viewers thereon, that the properties Nos. 912 and 913, measuring from the center of each property, are 141 feet from Ninth street and 250 feet from Tenth street; that the properties Nos. 924 and 925, from the centers thereof, are 240 feet from Ninth street and 151 feet from Tenth street; that the properties Nos. 918 and 919, measuring from the centers thereof, are 192 feet from Ninth street and 199 feet from Tenth street. It further appears from said revised plan that Melon street is about 49 feet in width, including sidewalks, and from curb to curb is about 25 feet in width. It further appears, in the language of the report of the jury of view, "that the damage to the claimants' properties upon Melon street is caused by the closing up of Ninth street and Melon street in manner aforesaid, thus depriving them of an outlet eastward by way of Ninth street to the general system of streets in the city of Philadelphia. Their outlet to the westward is not in any way impaired." From these facts disclosed by the record we have this proposition: Are the owners of thirteen lots abutting on the portion of Melon street not vacated, situated about equidistant between Ninth and Tenth streets, entitled to damages by reason of the vacation of Ninth and Melon streets, thus depriving them of an outlet eastward to the general system of streets while their outlet westward to and through Tenth street to the same general system of streets is unimpaired?

In discussing this proposition, in order to sustain the contention and claim of the appellee it must clearly appear that these thirteen owners of properties on Melon street have sustained injury distinct from that of the public in general. It is for the court to instruct the jury, as matter of law, what constitutes special injury, and the jury to find the amount thereof. In this case, under these facts, can it be said, as matter of law, that the properties Nos. 924 and 925 have been specially injured and Nos. 926 and 927 on the same street have not? No such rule can be established, and no attempt to establish such a rule has ever been successfully made. Properties abutting on the vacated portion of a street are specially injured because access to such properties is essential to the enjoyment thereof and is so coupled with the properties as to be a part thereof. So, when the vacation of part of a street actually destroys or renders impracticable access to properties on the same street, but not abutting on the vacated portion, there is a special injury on the same principle. By adhering to this rule it is easy to declare what constitutes special injury. By departing from it how can juries be instructed where special injury begins and ends? The language of the act of 1858 is as broad as the provisions of the 8th section of article 16 of the Constitution, and the decisions of our supreme court, in construing the constitutional provision, can be safely resorted to in deciding the question of injury in this case. In Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Lippincott, 116 Pa. 472, where the erection of the company's elevated tracks on the opposite side of the street did not in any way prevent free access to the plaintiff's property, it was held that there was no such injury thereto as would entitle him to recover. In Chester County v. Brower, 117 Pa. 647, where the county had erected a bridge over a creek in the borough of Phoenixville, and in the construction of abutments or approaches to the bridge had built a wing wall in front of the plaintiff's house and only 7 feet distant therefrom, thereby seriously interfering with his access thereto and his reasonable use and enjoyment of the same, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. In Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Marchant, 119 Pa. 541, the facts were that the elevated railroad of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company was built on the south side of Filbert street, and in its construction in no way prevented free access to the plaintiff's property. Chief Justice Paxson distinguished the case from Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Duncan [111 Pa. 352], where access to the property was destroyed. In Gold v. Philadelphia, 115 Pa. 184, where the city authorities left the street in front of plaintiff's property in such bad condition as to be almost impassable, and all persons who could do so avoided it, whereby plaintiff's business as an innkeeper was greatly reduced, because of the fact that her ingress to and egress from the property were not prevented, she was held not to have suffered such a special injury as to entitle her to maintain her action. The court said, in affirming the court below: "The learned referee ruled this case upon the familiar and well-settled principle that one who is injured by a public nuisance, either in his person or in his property, cannot have his remedy by action unless he can show a damage which is peculiar to himself, and different in kind and degree from and beyond that which is sustained by the general public." In Dooner v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 143 Pa. 86, among other facts agreed upon was the following: "That the premises of the plaintiff consist of a lot of ground and a three-story brick messuage thereon erected, situate on the north side of Filbert at the distance of 34 feet east of Nineteenth street, containing in front on Filbert street 16 feet and extending in depth 117 feet to Cuthbert street. The said Filbert street is 51 feet wide, and the entire width thereof intervenes between the plaintiff's premises and the defendant's road at the point where the said elevated railroad passes in front of the plaintiff's premises." It was held that the plaintiff could not recover, and that the case was governed by Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Lippincott.

In Pennsylvania S. Valley R. Co. v. Walsh, 124 Pa. 544, and Pennsylvania S. Valley R. Co. v. Ziemer, 124 Pa. 560, the plaintiffs were awarded damages on the ground that access to their properties was cut off, and in his opinion Chief Justice Paxson, in the former case, says: "The track was laid close to the curbstone on the side of the street next to the plaintiff's property, by means of which the access thereto, if not actually cut off, was rendered dangerous."

In McGee's Appeal, 114 Pa. 470, the city of Pittsburgh, under legislative authority, vacated a portion of Washington street and allowed the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to occupy the same. McGee owned property abutting Washington street beyond the vacated portion, and applied for an injunction to restrain the city and railroad company from vacating the street. The injunction was dissolved on the ground that "public streets and highways belong to the commonwealth, and when the government sees fit to vacate them the consequential loss, if there be any, must be borne by those who suffer it."

The cases from other states cited by appellant's counsel in their exhaustive and able argument are strikingly in point.

Smith v. Boston, 7 Cush. 254, was a petition for assessment of damages alleged to have been done to the plaintiff in his property by the discontinuance of a portion of Market street, in the city of Boston, by the order of the mayor and aldermen.

The discontinuance complained of was all that part of Market street covered by the Boston & Maine Extension Railroad, the proprietors of which had been permitted by their charter to extend their road through part of the city. The petitioner owned several lots on or near Market street, and offered to prove that the value of each had been lessened and the rent of one or more of them diminished, but it appeared that no one of the parcels bounded on that part of the street which had been discontinued, and that all were accessible by other public streets. The presiding judge ruled that the petitioner was not by law entitled to prove and recover any damages, because neither of his estates abutted on that part of Market street which was discontinued, and by his direction a verdict was entered for the respondents. Upon exception to this ruling the case was heard in the supreme court.

The Massachusetts Revised Statutes, chap. 24, § 11, provides for payment if any damage shall be sustained by any person in their property by the laying out, altering, or discontinuing of any highway.

Shaw, Chief Justice, in overruling the exceptions, said: "He [plaintiff] may feel it [the inconvenience from shutting up of the street], more in consequence of the proximity of his lots and buildings, still it is a damage of like kind, and not in its nature peculiar or specific.

... Though a man who lives near it [an obstruction in a highway] and has occasion to pass it daily, suffers a damage altogether greater than one who lives at a distance, he can have no private action, because in its nature it is common and public."

The damage complained of in this case, though it may be greater in degree in consequence of the proximity of the petitioner's estate, does not differ in kind from that of the other members of the community who would have occasion, more or less frequently, to pass over the discontinued highway. The petitioner has free access to all his lots. The burden of his complaint therefore is that in going to some of his houses in some directions he may be obliged to go farther than he otherwise would. So must the inhabitants of the south end of the city, or the citizens of other towns, with their teams or carriages, who have a right to use the discontinued highway.

To the same effect are Davis v. Hampshire County Comrs. 158 Mass. 218, 11 L. R. A. 750; Hammond v. Worcester County Comrs. 154 Mass. 509; Stanwood v. Malden, 157 Mass. 17, 16 L. R. A. 691.

In Chicago v. Union Bldg. Assn. 102 Ill. 379, 40 Am. Rep. 598, it was proposed to vacate a street, and a property owner three and one-half blocks away filed a bill to prevent it, 38 L. R. A.

leging that it would thereby suffer great damage to its property. The supreme court reversed the decree of the lower court, granting the prayer of the bill, on the ground that no special or peculiar injury was shown, since it could not be reasonably claimed that the closing of the street in any degree interfered with access to its lot or its use and enjoyment. Though this property had been specially assessed as benefited by the opening of the portion of the street now to be vacated, it was held that this gave it no special property in that part of the street.

In Kimball v. Homan, 74 Mich. 699, petition for certiorari to review action of commissioner discontinuing Centre street from Hall street to Home street. Plaintiff claimed to own land on the south side of Home street and east side of Centre street. Notice of proceedings was given only to landowners on that portion of street discontinued. The Michigan statute, which allowed highways or parts of highways to be discontinued, required notice to be given to owners and occupants of land through or adjoining which it was proposed to discontinue; and also that the commissioner should view the premises, determine the necessity of discontinuing the highway, and appraise the damage on account thereof, if any is claimed. It was held that the meaning of this was to confine the adjacency to the part discontinued, and that the only persons who can complain must be such as are directly affected in their convenience of access to their property, and who are liable to lose their immediate means of communication, and that plaintiff, who had another mode of access to his property, had no interest in the proceeding.

In Shaubut v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. 21 Minn. 504, plaintiff was an owner of land upon a street, another part of which was unlawfully obstructed by the defendant. Held, that the injury suffered by plaintiff in consequence of the obstruction was an injury in common with the public at large, the only difference in the injury suffered by him and that suffered by the public being a difference in degree, not in kind. The court said: "What might be the plaintiff's rights, if the obstructions had the effect to cut off access to his land, we need not inquire, since both the diagram and the testimony in the case show that he has that access, through other streets, without the necessity of passing over the obstructed portion of Washington street."

In Brakken v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 29 Minn. 41, where the question of obstructing access arose, the court held that the owner of land abutting on a public street has, as such, a special interest in the street, different from that of the general public, as to entitle him to maintain a private suit for damages against the party who wrongfully obstructs the street in front of or near his property so as practically to cut off public access to it.

Re Vacation of Centre Street, 115 Pa. 247, does not sustain the right of property owners on the same street not abutting on the part vacated to recover special damages. By an examination of the case in the court below, reported in 17 W. N. C. 809, it appears that the plaintiff's property abutted on Centre street.

Re Vacation of Howard Street, 142 Pa. 601, decides that the act of 1858 is constitutional, and was in full operation in the city of Philadelphia on January 25, 1889, and does not touch the question under consideration.

It is claimed by the appellees that Mellor v. Philadelphia, 160 Pa. 614, rules this case, and fully sustains the court below on the question of injury and damage. To this proposition the writer of this opinion and the majority of this court do not assent. The facts in Mellor v. Philadelphia, as stated by the reporter, are as follows: "At the trial it appeared that the sixteen plaintiffs owned houses and lots on Trenton avenue, a narrow street running east and west along the Pennsylvania Railroad in Frankford. Ten of the properties were between Orthodox street and Margaret street. Six of the properties were to the west of Orthodox street. The first group of ten properties had ingress and egress by Trenton avenue to enter Orthodox street or Margaret street. The second group of six properties had ingress and egress by Trenton avenue to Orthodox street or Oxford street, which was 850 feet further west. Councils of the city of Philadelphia, deeming it desirable to do away with grade crossings, passed an ordinance to lower the grade of Orthodox and Margaret streets and thus carry them under the railroad. In carrying out this work, the streets were depressed about 15 feet, cutting off access by vehicles to and from the first group of ten properties, and also cutting off access by way of Orthodox street to the second group of six houses." In his charge, speaking of the western group of six properties, Judge Thayer said: "If you find that the cutting down of Orthodox street has materially impaired the facilities which the owners of these properties had before for getting into and out of their property, that Oxford street cannot afford them the facilities which they had before because the road between Oxford street in front of these houses and Orthodox street is so narrow that wagons and carts cannot conveniently enter and turn round, if you find that the property has been materially damaged by that, and that they now have only one way of egress from their properties, which is in itself a defective way, putting them to great inconvenience and affecting the value of the property, then I charge you that such an injury is within the protection of the Constitution, and you should find for the plaintiffs for whatever damages the properties have actually sustained in consequence of the altered grade."

Under the facts thus stated and found the jury assessed damages in favor of the owners of both groups of properties, on the principle that where access to properties is practically destroyed a special injury results, though the property does not abut on the street or part of street vacated or changed.

In the case last above cited, two streets running at right angles to Trenton street were so changed in grade by depression as to render Trenton avenue impossible of access between the two streets, and on account of the narrowness of Trenton street on the city plan, it being so narrow between Orthodox and Oxford streets that wagons and carts could not conveniently enter and turn round, there was no difference in the degree of injury, and, under the peculiar facts of the case, both groups of properties received special injury by being deprived of the means of egress and ingress.

In this case no such facts exist. That the properties in question on Melon street were deprived of their outlet eastward is undisputed. It is equally undisputed that Melon street, before the vacation, was an open public highway from Ridge avenue to the westerly side of Ninth street; that it was 49 feet wide, including sidewalks, and 25 feet wide from curb to curb. And it is also undisputed that their outlet westward was not in any way impaired. The western half of the properties were some of them as near Tenth street as Ninth street, and the extreme easterly property was only about 100 feet nearer Ninth than Tenth street. The most that can be said is that these property owners were inconvenienced in being deprived of an additional outlet; but, under the facts in this case, they suffered no special injury which the general public did not suffer in common with them, and they are therefore not entitled to damages.

The distinction between the case of Mellor v. Philadelphia, 160 Pa. 614, and the case under consideration is obvious. In the former case the municipal authorities, when they depressed the grade of Orthodox street, knew, from the plan of streets in the vicinity, that Trenton street was so narrow between Orthodox and Oxford streets that access by way of Oxford street was practically destroyed, and that a special injury to every property between these streets must result. This element of damage pervaded the case and was fairly submitted to the jury at the trial, and the judgment was affirmed. In the case under consideration the appellees were inconvenienced, and the facts clearly show that their access to the plan of general streets by way of Tenth street is open, ample, unobstructed, and unimpaired, and from the facts thus established it follows that the appellees have sustained no special injury. In the former case a cul de sac resulted that could not be used. In the case under consideration a cul de sac also resulted, but no owner of property abutting thereon is deprived of free access to his property.

In Laurence v. Philadelphia, 154 Pa. 20, we have the proposition of the owner of thirteen adjoining houses and lots, four of which fronted on Second street, in the city of Philadelphia, four adjoining on Venango street, and five others adjoining on Cooper street. Second street crossed Venango street and Cooper street at right angles. The grade of Second street was raised 9 feet, and this change of grade cut off access to the properties on Venango and Cooper streets absolutely by way of Second street. Under the facts thus stated the court held that the plaintiff could recover damages to his property fronting on Second street caused by the change of its grade, but could not recover as to his properties on Venango and Cooper streets. In the report of that case the facts do not fully appear, but the plaintiff could have been denied the right to damages to his property on Venango and Cooper streets only on the ground that he had free access thereto through other streets connecting with the general system of streets in the city of Philadelphia. Thus explained, this case fully supports the appellant's position.

It is urged by the appellees that because the jury of view gave special damages to each of the thirteen property owners, it therefore follows, by implication, that their finding was based upon some facts warranting the giving of such damages. But such implication is rebutted, and must fall in connection with the undisputed facts which the record discloses, to wit, that before the vacation Melon street was an open public highway, nearly 50 feet wide, and the outlet through this open highway to Tenth street was not in any way impaired by the vacation. Under this view of the case it follows that the second, third, fourth, ninth, and eleventh assignments of error must be sustained.

The fifth, sixth, and seventh assignments of error are overruled. While the jury of view, under the terms of the petition filed in the court below, had no right to ascertain and report any damage caused by the vacation of Ninth street, yet, having done so, in connection with the damage caused by the vacation of Melon street, if we were to affirm the court below this court could order the filing of a proper and sufficient release on the part of the appellees as to all damage caused by the vacation of Ninth street, so as to thoroughly protect the rights of the appellant.

In considering the eighth and twelfth assignments of error, we must first notice the character of the question submitted to the jury of view on the subject of benefits. By the provisions of the act of 1858, we have seen that the first duty of the jury of view was "to ascertain and report to the court what damages the parties claiming were entitled to; and, second, to assess and apportion the same among and against such owners of land as shall be benefited by such opening, widening, or vacating any such road or street."

This statutory provision, if followed, was a sure guide to the jury of view in assessing, apportioning, and reporting benefits. They were commanded to ascertain the owners of land benefited and report the same to the court. Like any other statutory submission, their award must be in conformity with the statutory requirements, and if it fails in that respect it cannot be sustained. In their report the jury found that all the land abutting on both sides of the portion of Melon street vacated belonged to the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company. The jury further found "that in the construction of the Philadelphia & Reading Terminal Railroad and its necessary works that company had entered upon and occupied a portion of Ninth street so stricken from the city plan, and also that portion of Melon street which has been stricken from the city plan, as aforesaid." And further, "that the Philadelphia & Reading Terminal Railroad Company is specially benefited to an amount not less than $9,750."

Nowhere in the viewer's report does it appear that the Philadelphia & Reading Terminal Railroad Company was the owner of any land benefited at the time the report was made and filed. If that company was not the owner of land benefited, it was not liable to assessment for benefits; if it was, then it was the imperative duty of the jury to affirmatively find and report that fact to the court. Such is the command of the statute.

In Reistenbaugh v. Cheater Valley R. Co. 21 Pa. 105, Mr. Justice Woodward says: "But to enable the court to determine in every case whether the viewers have confined their assessment of damages to the subject-matter provided for in the general law, or in special acts of incorporation, it is apparent the report should exhibit the grounds of the assessment."

In this case the jury have reported that the Philadelphia & Reading Terminal Railroad Company is benefited, but they did not find another equally important fact prescribed by the statute, to wit, that the said company was the owner of land benefited. We are asked by the appellees to find the necessary ownership of land in the Reading Terminal Railroad Company from the viewers' report by implication; if we do, the implication must be a necessary implication. Does it follow of necessity that because the appellant was in actual occupancy of a portion of Melon street vacated, it was therefore the owner of land as contemplated by the statutory provision? Whether the company is there in possession of the vacated street for one year or one hundred years, whether as lessee or licensee, does not appear. From the fact of occupancy, ownership does not follow by necessary implication.

It is also urged that from the fact that the jury found that the appellant was benefited in the sum of at least $9,750, therefore, by implication, it follows from the finding of that fact that the company must have been the owner of land, or the jury would not have found it was benefited. Such a proposition answers itself, for the fact that the jury found the appellant benefited in no way implies its ownership of land.

In Re Vacation of Centre Street, 115 Pa. 247, the report of the jury stated that in consequence of the vacation of the street the petitioners had received special damage, and that the land owned by the Pennsylvania & Schuylkill Valley Railroad Company in the locality of said portion of said street had received special benefit from said vacation. This was held a sufficient description of property and ownership, and warranted the jury in assessing the benefits against the company. That case, however, is not an authority sustaining the position of the appellees; in fact, it is to the contrary. The assessment and apportionment of benefits not appearing to be against the owner of land in the report of viewers filed in the court below, said report therefore cannot be sustained. The eighth and twelfth assignments of error are sustained.

The judgment is reversed, and the report of the jury of view set aside at the cost of the appellees.

RICE, P. J., dissenting:

The appellant's counsel contend that there cannot be any recovery by the claimants, because none of them was the owner of property within that part of Melon street which was vacated. They do not claim that they were not damaged—and in the face of the report of viewers, unappealed from, cannot do so—but do contend that there must be, not only damage, but injury in the legal sense must exist.

To this latter proposition I give my unqualified assent, but I am not prepared to concede that the loss which the claimants have sustained in consequence of the closing up of Ninth street and the eastern end of Melon street is damnum absque injuria.

The right to compensation for loss sustained by a property owner in consequence of the vacation of a street is, in Pennsylvania, purely statutory. It was clearly decided in Paul v. Carter, 24 Pa. 207, 64 Am. Dec. 649, that the legislature has power to vacate streets and highways which, in its judgment or that of the municipal authorities to whom the power is delegated, are useless, inconvenient, or burdensome, and this without providing compensation to the owners of land incidentally injured.

Judge Black said, "Surrendering the right of way over a public road to the owners of the soil is not taking private property for public use, and the proprietors of other land incidentally injured by the discontinuance of the road are not entitled to compensation."

This doctrine was in harmony with the ruling in O'Connor v. Pittsburgh, 18 Pa. 189, that "the constitutional provision for the case of private property taken for public use extends not to the case of property injured or destroyed; but," added Chief Justice Gibson, "it follows not that the omission may not be supplied by ordinary legislation."

The injustice which constantly resulted from the ruling in this case—an injustice which Chief Justice Gibson thought so great that it ought to be remedied by appropriate legislation—was, to some extent, provided against by § 10, art. 1, and § 8, art. 16, of the Constitution of 1874; but it has been held, for reasons which in no way affect the present case, that an injury caused by the vacation of a street is not within these constitutional provisions. No private property is "taken or applied to public use" within the meaning of the section first referred to, or "taken, injured, or destroyed by the construction or enlargement of their works, highways, or improvements" within the meaning of the section last mentioned. McGee's Appeal, 114 Pa. 470.

But it is too plain for argument that a property owner may suffer injury in consequence of the vacation of a street, not only different in degree, but different in kind, from that suffered by the general public. It is the same kind of an injury which he suffers from a change of grade; and, upon the same principles of justice and equity which were recognized in O'Connor v. Pittsburgh, and which led to the adoption of the constitutional provisions above referred to, the state, although as the sovereign having power to inflict it without compensating him, may give such compensation, and provide for its payment by the state or the municipality, or its apportionment amongst the persons or properties benefited. This was expressly decided in the construction of the very act under which the present proceedings were had. Re Vacation of Centre Street, 115 Pa. 247.

"That the Commonwealth was under no constitutional obligation to pay for the damage caused by vacating a street was decided in Paul v. Carter, 24 Pa. 207, 64 Am. Dec. 649, and is so held under the present Constitution. McGee's Appeal, 114 Pa. 470. But it has never been held, nor, so far as I am aware, seriously contended, that the legislature might not put such obligation on the Commonwealth or its agents by statute. The principle of compensation was extended by the present Constitution so as to include, in certain cases, not only property taken, but property injured. This provision might have been, and to some extent was, in fact, anticipated by statutes providing for such compensation by assessments in the nature of special and local taxation." Vacation of Howard Street, 142 Pa. 601; Hare v. Rice, 142 Pa. 608, Mitchell, J.

The legislature, in the exercise of its undoubted power, having guaranteed compensation for injury caused to private property by the vacation of a street, the question arises whether the right is limited to properties abutting on the portion of the street vacated. No one could or does contend that an unqualified affirmative answer to this question would be justified upon any principle. If, for illustration, Ninth and Tenth streets had been vacated, we think no one would say that the properties of the claimants abutting on that portion of Melon street lying between the two streets vacated would not suffer injury in a legal sense, or that the legislature did not intend to give compensation for the kind of injury which those properties would sustain. Undoubtedly the legislature might refuse compensation in such a case, but has not done so.

But it is said that in the case supposed access to the property of the claimants would be wholly destroyed, while in the case in hand access by way of Ninth street only is taken away. But why should the statute be construed to give a right to compensation in the one case and not in the other? What authority is there for saying that a claimant must show that he has been wholly deprived of access to his property in order to entitle him to recover damages? Take the case in hand. The claimants may still go to and from all parts of the city by way of Tenth street, but are now compelled to go further to reach points to the eastward. This is an inconvenience, and by the diversion of travel may cause a depreciation in the value of their property; but it is generally held to be the same kind of inconvenience as that which all the inhabitants of the city traveling that way must suffer. It is an interference with the right of passage over the street which was before enjoyed, and is not of itself a legal wrong for which a private suit at common law could have been sustained.

It may be conceded that it is not an injury for which the claimants would be entitled to recover damages under the statute; but, in addition to the right of passage which they enjoyed in common with the general public, was their right or interest in the street as a mode of access to their properties, and there may result from a destruction or impairment of access a special injury which would not be sustained by the other members of the general public. It would seem to be manifest that the conversion of an open highway connecting with another street into a cul de sac would, as to the properties thus deprived of one mode of ingress and egress, be evidence of a special injury, possibly differing in degree, but not in kind, from that resulting from closing up both ends of the street.

A variety of special circumstances—the width of the street upon which the properties abut, the grade, the kind of traffic, the distance—would enter into the determination of the amount of damages sustained. In some cases they might be very trifling; but cases may very readily be imagined where they would be very serious; and I am not prepared to say that the mere fact that the properties do not abut on the portion of the street vacated would be conclusive upon the legal question—whether such an act would be an injury.

The learned counsel for the appellant frankly concede that the question is a new one in Pennsylvania. Therefore, we are not prevented by authoritative precedents from giving that interpretation to the statute which will carry out the manifest intention of the legislature to remedy an injustice, which Paul v. Carver showed was possible under the law as it stood before.

I agree that some well-defined principle ought to control the assessment of damages; but there is a difficulty in laying down a general rule applicable to all cases, and the rule contended for seems to derive its chief support from the supposed inconveniences that would result if it is not adopted.

This argument is not without force, but it seems to me that it is given too much weight. It is said if the rule contended for is not established, where will be the limit to claims for damages? Questions like this can be addressed with much more force to the legislature than to the courts; but, after all, the difficulties which would arise from a more liberal interpretation of the statute are more imaginary than real; they are not greater than those which might have been, and indeed were anticipated from the introduction into the fundamental law of the principle of compensation for the injury and destruction, as well as the taking, of private property in the exercise of the right of eminent domain. It is not to be supposed that the legislature were ignorant of the difficulties which are now urged upon our consideration, but they were not of sufficient gravity to deter them from enacting a law broad enough in its terms to secure compensation to these claimants, if, in fact, they have suffered substantial injury of a special nature. It is as broad as the constitutional provision; the injury is of the same kind as that caused by a change of grade; there is no reason for a stricter rule in one case than in the other; and there is no authoritative decision which requires us to make a distinction.

If I am correct in this, then the language of Chief Justice Sterrett, in Mellor v. Philadelphia, 160 Pa. 614, construing the constitutional provision and applying it to a case of damages caused by a change of grade, might appropriately have been written for this case. "Defendant's contention was that this provision is inapplicable to any of the cases under consideration, because neither of the properties fronts or abuts on either of the streets the grade of which was changed. This would, indeed, be a very narrow and unreasonable construction of the words above quoted, especially in view of the history and object of the constitutional provision. . . . There is nothing in the phraseology of the section that can be even tortured into a limitation of its provisions to property fronting or abutting on the particular work, highway, or improvement, by the construction or enlargement of which said property was injured or destroyed. The section in question cannot be thus narrowly construed without reading into it words which are not in it and were never intended to be there."

The case is like this in so many parts that it seems to me that it might be regarded as ruling it. There access to the properties by way of Orthodox street was destroyed by lowering the grade of the latter street; but Trenton avenue, upon which the properties abutted, and Oxford street, which it intersected, remained as before. Here access to the properties by way of Ninth street was destroyed by the vacation of that street and the eastern end of Melon street; but the portion of the latter street on which these properties abut and Tenth street, which intersects, are unchanged. The outlet in that direction remains as before. In neither case was access to the properties wholly destroyed, but in both cases the conversion of the highway in front of them into a blind street was evidence of an impairment of access to the properties which might be proper to submit to a jury under appropriate instructions of the kind given in the cited case.

Whether the injury was as great in this case as in that it is impossible to say without having a knowledge of all the facts which would have been brought before the court if an appeal had been taken, as was done in the case cited, but cannot come before the court on exceptions to the report. It is true we have the undisputed facts—that the properties do not abut on the part of the street vacated; that the street is nearly 50 feet wide; and that the outlet to the westward is the same as before. If these facts are sufficient in law to base a conclusion that the claimants have not sustained an injury which would entitle them to recover the damages allowed by the viewers—if, in other words, we can say, as a matter of law, that access to their properties has not been impaired—then the report ought to have been set aside. But this is what we must declare if we sustain the appellant's second, third, fourth, ninth, and eleventh assignments of error, and I do not think we can do so and at the same time harmonize our decisions with the just principle upon which a recovery was allowed in Mellor v. Philadelphia.

It is argued that an affirmation of the judgment of the quarter sessions in this case will be in the face of every authority upon the question. I have endeavored to show that such a ruling would be in entire harmony with the principle enunciated in Mellor v. Philadelphia, and, if time and space permitted, I think that it could be shown that it is not in conflict with the great weight of authority. It is true, some of the cases do lay down the rule that where a part of a street is vacated those whose property does not abut upon the vacated portion, and who have access to their property by the remaining portion of the street, cannot complain.

In some of the states, especially in Massachusetts, this rule has been adhered to with great strictness, but even there the principle was thus explained in one of the latest cases: It is not enough to show that a shop has suffered by the diversion of travel, or that the owner finds travel less convenient at a distance from his place, if the access to the system of public streets remains substantially unimpaired. Stanwood v. Malden, 157 Mass. 17, 16 L. R. A. 591. In that case the court said that the means of access were ample, and in the leading case in that state, Smith v. Boston, 7 Cush. 254, the court said: "The petitioner has free access to all his lots by public streets."

Are we prepared to declare in this case that access to the claimants' properties has not been impaired? Can the court say to these claimants "one opening to your properties is sufficient for your purposes, therefore no legal injury has been done to you by closing the other?" Could we say that if their properties fronted on two parallel streets, or were on the corner of two streets, one of which was vacated? Is it not more in accord with sound principle to say that their right of access was not limited by the frontage of their properties, but extended to the two intersecting streets, and that it is for the jury to say whether, under all the circumstances, the claimants have suffered substantial damages in consequence of the closing of one mode of access?

A learned text-writer, after reviewing the authorities, says: "It has been held that the vacation and closing of one street afforded no ground of complaint when access remained by other streets, but we should doubt this proposition as universally applicable." Lewis, Em. Dom. § 134. Another writer says: "But the more liberal opinion is that the fact that access may be had from another direction is not conclusive evidence that there is no legal injury to property." Randolph, Em. Dom. § 411. He cites Gargan v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 89 Ky. 212, 6 L. R. A. 340, as deciding that "if a convenient way be cut off, leaving only a decidedly inconvenient one, the abutting owner may have compensation."

If we leave out of consideration the cases which are based wholly on a construction of constitutional provisions like ours, and cases where the statutes under consideration were held not to contemplate the recovery of consequential damages, it will be found that the cases in which it has been held that the rigid rule, as stated by the appellant, applies, where the street was converted into a cul de sac, are very few, although I do not say that there are none.

In Chicago v. Union Bldg. Assn. 102 Ill. 380, 40 Am. Rep. 598, the part of the street to be vacated was three and one-half blocks, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile distant, and the only injurious consequences were that persons passing from the claimant's property down the street would have, on arriving at the obstruction, to go a little further and make a slight detour—precisely the same injury that would be sustained by every person having to pass by that route.

59 Am. Rep. 795, the question decided was, as stated by the court, "Can defendant, as a matter of law, be held liable to the plaintiff for damages resulting from the vacation of streets and alleys between Front and Fourth streets,—the vacation being in another block in the city than that in which plaintiff's property is situated?"

So, in Michigan, it was held that a petitioner had no interest and was not entitled to notice of proceeding because he could not reach the discontinued way without crossing a public street (Kimball v. Homan, 74 Mich. 699); but where the discontinuance of a highway leaves the way to a landowner's house a cul de sac, he is directly interested in the proceedings and is entitled to notice. Goss v. Westphalia Twp. Highway Comrs. 63 Mich. 608.

In Whitsett v. Union Depot & R. Co. 10 Colo. 243, none of the lots of the plaintiff abutted on those portions of the streets or alleys vacated, but all were on other blocks; hence the court properly held that the access to and egress from his lot is not affected by the vacating ordinances passed by the city.

The same was the case in Glasgow v. St. Louis, 107 Mo. 198, and the court held that the case was not within the constitutional provision because there was no physical interference with the plaintiff's property and no right of easement connected therewith or entrance thereto was affected.

In the other Missouri case cited by the appellant (Bailey v. Culver, 12 Mo. App. 175), the point decided was that "the substitution of a deflected alley for a straight one does no more than to change the direction of their exterior communications, and this being at a point beyond the confines of their property, is as harmless to their absolute rights as if it were in any other part of the city."

The case was precisely the same in principle as those in which the street vacated was in another block, and was put upon the same ground, namely, that being compelled to travel further to reach other points it was an inconvenience which the claimants would suffer in common with the general public.

Neither of the Minnesota cases cited (Shaubert v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. 21 Minn. 502, and Brakken v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 29 Minn. 41), is parallel to the present one. The first is not because the obstruction was in another block, and the second is not because access was wholly cut off. Both are in point, however, because they recognize the general principle that the right of access gives an abutting landowner a special interest in the street, even beyond the limits of the frontage of his property.

The case of Coater v. Albany, 43 N. Y. 399, is sometimes cited in support of the proposition that the vacation and closing of one street affords no ground of complaint where access remains by other streets; but a careful reading of that case, I think, shows that it was decided upon a construction of the statute which confessedly cannot be given to our statute, namely, that it did not give the right to consequential damages.

It is sometimes said that the right of an abutting landowner in an open street is coextensive only with the necessities of the case; but this doctrine cannot be sustained upon any sound principle, nor by the weight of authority where a statute as broad as ours is in force.

In Duke Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Bd. of Works, L. R. 5 H. L. 418, cited in Randolph on Eminent Domain, § 411, the right of access to the river Thames was held to appertain to every foot of the adjacent land of the plaintiff, though access had been habitually gained at a single point only. The same principle was held to apply where the tract in question abutted on more than one street. The deprivation of access to one street is an injury, although another street affords egress. Fort Scott, W. & W. R. Co. v. Fox, 42 Kan. 490.

I have made this review of the cases, most of which were cited by the learned counsel for the appellant, not to show that they expressly decide that a recovery can be had in such a case as this, but to show that it is not decided by the great weight of authority that there cannot be a recovery.

Coming back to a consideration of the case upon general principles, and assuming that a property owner can recover such damages only as are special to him, and that this includes only damages consequent upon a deprivation or impairment of access to his property, I would hold that the facts set forth in this report, whether taken singly or together, do not raise a presumption of law or of fact that the claimants have not suffered such damage, and the report being in due form is sufficient to sustain the assessment.

Is the omission of the viewers to report specifically that the appellant is an owner of land benefited by the vacation a fatal defect?

In Re Vacation of Centre Street, 115 Pa. 247, it was decided that the assessment of special benefits for the purpose of raising a fund to pay those who have been damaged by the vacation of streets is a species of taxation, and within the power of the legislature. It was also held that under the act of 1858 now under consideration, the assessment might be made against the owner of the land benefited personally. Chief Justice Sterrett said: "While it is perhaps true that such assessments are generally against the property benefited, and not against the owner thereof personally, the fact that the legislature has authorized them to be made against the owner, as in this case, cannot affect the constitutionality of the law. The object, in either case, is to provide a mode of collecting the assessment, and that is wholly within the discretion of the legislature. Desty, Taxn. 286."

It is nevertheless true that the assessment can only be made against the owner of the land, and that the assessment cannot exceed the benefit to the land. Both of these facts should appear expressly or by necessary implication in the report; but it seems that an omission to describe the land is not a fatal defect. Re Vacation of Centre Street, 115 Pa. 247. But the ordinance annexed to and made part of the petition, and referred to in the report, contains this clause: "Provided, That the Philadelphia & Reading Terminal Railroad Company shall pay all expenses and damages arising from the said revision, and that it shall enter into a contract with the city of Philadelphia, in a form to be approved by the city 88 L. R. A. solicitor, covenanting to pay all such expenses, and damages, and to indemnify the city of Philadelphia from any liability for or on account of the said revision."

It may be fairly inferred that the contract was entered into in compliance with the condition, for the report states that the revision of the city plans contemplated by the ordinance was made and duly confirmed by the board of surveyors, and that the appellant, in the construction of its necessary works, had entered upon and occupied those portions of Ninth and Melon streets stricken from the city plan as aforesaid.

The report further sets forth "the vacation of Melon street on account of the closing of Ninth street for the benefit of the Philadelphia & Reading Terminal Railroad Company was part of a general scheme or plan for the revision of plans of the city streets in the vicinity of Philadelphia & Reading Terminal Railroad Company, made necessary by the building of its elevated railroad to its new terminal station at Twelfth and Market streets, in the city of Philadelphia."

Under these circumstances may not a fair presumption of such ownership of land as would make the appellant liable to assessment arise from the occupancy of it by works of the permanent character referred to in the petition and report? It is said that no such presumption can arise, because the report shows that all the land abutting on that part of Melon street stricken from the city plan belongs to the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company; but it by no means follows that this is the only land which would subject the owner to assessment, nor am I convinced that the ownership contemplated by the statute must be in fee simple.

It appears with sufficient certainty that the appellant is in the actual occupancy of land which might subject the owner to assessment for benefits thereto, with works of a permanent nature, namely, an elevated road connecting with its terminal station at Twelfth and Market streets; that the ordinances were passed for the benefit of the appellant, and upon condition that it would pay the expenses and damages caused by the vacation of the streets; that it had actually received, and is in the enjoyment of, the benefits which were intended, and it may be fairly inferred that it has complied with the condition by entering into the contract required by the ordinance.

These facts, taken together, take the place of a formal and specific averment of the ownership of land. But, say the counsel for the appellant, the roadbed of a railroad company cannot be assessed with benefits for such an improvement, and cite the sidewalk and paving cases in support of the proposition. But, as has been seen, this is not an assessment against the roadbed, but against the owner. The cases referred to were decided principally upon the ground that the improvements then under consideration could not, from their very nature, be a special benefit to the roadway of a railroad company, but the vacation of a street may be, and manifestly was in this case, a benefit; and when we come to the question of ownership it makes very little difference whether the appellant owns the roadbed in fee or has only the right of way. Junction R. Co. v. Philadelphia, 88 Pa. 424.

I would therefore hold that the omission referred to in the assignment of error under consideration was not, under the circumstances, fatal to the report. In order to prevent misunderstanding, however, it should be stated that this is not put upon the ground that the contract referred to in the ordinance, even if entered into by the appellant, would entitle the claimants to recover damages if their property is so situated that it has not, or could not, receive legal injury in consequence of the vacation of the streets in question. The fact is referred to simply in connection with the facts as to the occupancy of the land as bearing upon the question raised by the assignment of error under consideration.

For these reasons, in connection with the reasons assigned by the majority of the court upon the other two questions raised in the case, I would affirm the judgment of the court below.

BEAVER, J., concurs in the foregoing dissenting opinion.

Messrs. Frank M. Cody, M. Hampton Todd, and William H. Staake, for appellant Jacob L. Stadelman:

It is not necessary to state in terms upon the record that the case involves the construction or application of the Constitution, if the record otherwise shows that fact.

Miller v. Nicholls, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 811, 4 L. ed. 578; Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Needles, 118 U. S. 574, 38 L. ed. 1084.

This case is identical with Mellor v. Philadelphia, 160 Pa. 614, and is ruled by the principles laid down in that case.

For the assessment of benefits upon the Philadelphia & Reading Terminal Railroad Company we rely upon the case of Re Vacation of Centre Street, 115 Pa. 247.

Under the earlier constitutional provisions this court has uniformly held that the word "taken" was to be interpreted literally.

Case of Philadelphia & T. R. Co. 6 Whart. 25, 36 Am. Dec. 202; Struthers v. Dunkirk, W. & P. R. Co. 87 Pa. 282; O'Connor v. Pittsburgh, 18 Pa. 189; Monongahela Nav. Co. v. Coons, 6 Watts & S. 101.

To remedy this evil, to suppress this mischief, the clause of the section under consideration was adopted, the words "injured or destroyed" being added to cover the cases of consequential damage not included and relieved against by the word "taken" as construed by the court.

8 Meredith, Const. Debates, 597; Pusey v. Allegheny, 98 Pa. 532; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Lippincott, 116 Pa. 473; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Marchant, 119 Pa. 541.

If the property of a citizen had been injured and depreciated in value by the act of another citizen by obstructing a highway or otherwise injuring his property, the party injured would have an action to recover his damages, and if the nature of the injury was such that one verdict would compensate for all time, then the measure of damage was the total loss, present and future.

Miller v. Wilson, 24 Pa. 114; Palmer v. Sil- verthorn, 83 Pa. 65; Com. v. Passmore, 1 Serg. & R. 217; Serly v. Alden, 61 Pa. 802, 100 Am. Dec. 642; Duffield v. Rosenzweig, 144 Pa. 520; Paul v. Carver, 24 Pa. 207, 64 Am. Dec. 649.

The legislature has imposed the liability on the city of Philadelphia by the act of 1858 to make compensation for the damage done by the vacation of a street, and the constitutional phrase under consideration likewise gives a right of action for injuries of this character.

Rigney v. Chicago, 103 Ill. 64.

For a state to depreciate the value of the property of a citizen by agencies which at common law would have sustained an action between private individuals without making compensation is a deprivation of property inhibited by the Constitution of the state and the Constitution of the United States.

S. 817, 27 L. ed. 739; Columbia Delaware Bridge Co. v. Geisse, 35 N. J. L. 558; West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 47 U. S. 6 How. 507, 12 L. ed. 585.

Messrs. William W. Porter, Frederick J. Geiger, George Q. Horwitz, and Edward Brooks, Jr., for appellant William H. Bower:

Where access to private property has been injured or destroyed by the vacation of a street in Philadelphia, and there has been a consequent depreciation in the value of the property, the owner is entitled to compensation therefor.

Prior to 1858 no damages whatever could be recovered for injury to property arising from the vacation of a public road.

Paul v. Carver, 24 Pa. 207, 64 Am. Dec. 649.

The law, as it existed prior to 1858, was, so far as the city of Philadelphia is concerned, entirely changed by the act of April 21, 1858, which establishes the right of parties claiming the same to damages occasioned by the vacation of streets in Philadelphia.

Re Vacation of Centre Street, 115 Pa. 247; Vacation of Howard Street, 142 Pa. 601; Philadelphia & R. Terminal R. Co.'s Appeal, 1 Pa. Super. Ct. 63.

In the case of the opening of a street it is not necessary that a property shall have occupied a portion of the land actually comprised within the limits of the street opened in order that its owner may be entitled to compensation.

Snyder v. Lancaster, 20 W. N. C. 184.

By reason of the similarity of the acts providing for compensation in cases of change of grade, the same rule as to damages must apply to the vacation of streets.

Geiger v. Norristown, 6 Mont. Co. L. Rep. 157; Mellor v. Philadelphia, 160 Pa. 614.

In order that an owner may recover damages for injury to access to property, consequent upon a change of grade, his property need not abut upon the street the grade of which has been changed, nor need the access be entirely destroyed.

The omission of a jury of view, appointed to assess damages among the owners of land benefited by the vacation of a street, to find in express terms in their report that the person against whom the damages are assessed is the owner of land benefited by the vacation, is not a fatal defect in the proceedings.

Mr. Edward Thippen for appellants Sarah A. Eddowes et al.

Messrs. John G. Lamb and Thomas Hart, Jr., for appellee:

Unless a case involves public interest, or the decision is likely to be of importance as a precedent, or a decision of the supreme court is important to settle a matter upon which there is a diversity of opinion in other courts, the supreme court will not trench upon the final character of a judgment of the superior court.

Kraemer v. Guarantee Trust & S. D. Co. 178 Pa. 416; Ex parte Lau Ow Bew, 141 U. S. 583, 35 L. ed. 888; Re Woods, 148 U. S. 202, 36 L. ed. 125; Lau Ow Bew v. United States, 144 U. S. 47, 36 L. ed. 340; American Constr. Co. v. Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. 148 U. S. 372, 37 L. ed. 486.

Appeals to this court should not depend upon the very partial view of an unsuccessful party in the superior court that a constitutional question is involved.

Where a plaintiff below has had a free and fair trial, and where his rights are measured, not by laws made to affect him individually, but by general provisions of law applicable to all in like condition, even if he can be considered deprived of his property by an adverse result, the proceedings so resulting were in "due process of law" as that phrase is used in the Constitution of the United States.

Marchant v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 158 U. S. 880, 38 L. ed. 751.

It must appear from the record that the validity of the act of Congress or the constitutionality of the state law was drawn in question.

Miller v. Nicholls, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 811, 4 L. ed. 578.

The opinion of a court in rendering its decision is not a part of the record.

England v. Gebhardt, 112 U. S. 503, 28 L. ed. 811; Cathcart v. Com. 87 Pa. 108.

The benefit conferred, on the basis of which an act assessing the costs of a municipal improvement can only be held to be constitutional, must be a benefit to property.

Allegheny City v. Western Pennsylvania R. Co. 188 Pa. 375.

Local assessments can be made only for improvements which confer peculiar local benefits upon property which adjoins the improvement, and it is not competent to assess the cost of improving a part of a street of a city upon property not situated upon the street to be improved.

Morewood Avenue, 159 Pa. 20; Fifty-Fourth Street, 165 Pa. 8; Park Avenue Sewers, 169 Pa. 433; Witman v. Reading, 169 Pa. 375.

In a petition of this kind there must be set out the particular thing on account of which it is claimed the damage arises. It cannot be tolerated that under a petition claiming damages for the vacation of one street, damages for the vacation of some other street, even though it may be connected with the former, can be recovered.

It is nothing to say that the vacation of Melon street was part of the same general scheme as moved the vacation of Ninth street, and that both were for the same purpose.

If this petition had been drawn in terms for the vacation of Ninth street, the petitioners would not have been permitted to recover therefor.

Lawrence v. Philadelphia, 154 Pa. 20.

If a private individual had obstructed Melon street precisely as it has been vacated, it is beyond controversy that according to the law of Pennsylvania an owner of property on the part of the street not vacated, who still enjoyed full access to his property by means thereof, would not be entitled to sue.

Knowles v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 175 Pa. 623.

The utmost that can be claimed for the act of 1858 is that it thereby provided compensation for property peculiarly or specially injured by the vacation of streets.

In the present case, however, no such special damage is averred, nor can there be such damage.

The legislature has the power to vacate a public street, and the consequential loss, if any there be, must be borne by those who suffer it.

Paul v. Carter, 24 Pa. 207, 64 Am. Dec. 649.

The effect of the passage of the act of 1858 is to give damages in the case of the vacation of streets to those who had suffered such special damage as would have entitled them to recover in an action at common law had the act of vacation been an unauthorized one.

Fell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These appeals were taken from judgments of the superior court without special allowance on the filing of an affidavit that the cases involved the construction or application of the Constitution of this state. It does not appear from the record that any constitutional question is raised, and an appellant cannot be permitted to decide for himself whether he is entitled to an appeal without allowance. Unless it clearly appears from the record that the cases come within one of the exceptions named in the 7th section of the act creating the superior court, there must be an allowance of the appeal; and the petition therefore should set forth clearly and specifically what constitutional question is involved, and in what manner it is raised. As, however, the question of practice is new, and has not been provided for by rule, and as the cases are of public importance, and the judgments were rendered by a divided court, we overrule the motion to quash, and will consider the appeals as if before us by allowance of this court.

The proceedings in the quarter sessions were under the 6th section of the act of April 21, 1858 (Pub. Laws, 886), which places the owner of land in Philadelphia which has been injured by the vacation of a street upon the same footing to claim damages as the owner of land which has been injured by the opening or widening of a street. Hare v. Rice, 142 Pa. 608. This act was said by Mitchell, J., in the opinion in Vacation of Howard Street, 142 Pa. 89 L. R. A.

601, to extend the system long established in Philadelphia for the assessment of benefits for local improvements, and the application of the money so raised to compensate others whose property has been taken, to consequential injuries caused by the vacation of streets, and to anticipate the provision of the new Constitution, which secures compensation for consequential damages where property has been injured. Before the adoption of the new Constitution, the commonwealth was under no obligation to make compensation for damages caused by the vacation of streets. Paul v. Carver, 24 Pa. 207, 64 Am. Dec. 649. And for the purpose of this argument it may be conceded that upon its adoption no such duty is imposed by the provision that compensation shall be made for property taken, injured, or destroyed, and that the right to recover damages for injuries so resulting exists only by virtue of special legislative provision: McGee's Appeal, 114 Pa. 470. But the right to recover damages caused by the vacation of streets in Philadelphia has been conferred by the legislature, and the real question raised by these appeals is whether the claimants are within the right conferred. They are not owners of properties which abut on the part of Melon street which has been vacated, but by the vacation of a part of the street their properties are shut off from direct access to the system of streets to the east. The properties are left in a cul de sac and their market value is lessened thereby. The plaintiffs have sustained a loss, for which they are entitled to recover, unless the right to recover for injuries caused to private property by the vacation of a street is limited to those whose properties abut on the part of the street vacated. The question raised is an important one, as affecting not only proceedings under the special act of 1858, but also those instituted under the general act of May 16, 1891 (Pub. Laws, 75). For the loss or inconvenience caused by the vacation of a street which those who own properties abutting thereon share in common with the community at large there can be no recovery. Where their loss does not differ in kind from that sustained by all others who have occasion to use the street for the purpose of travel, it is damnum absque injuria. But the owners of properties which have depreciated in value by reason of the closing of the street have sustained an injury in their property rights which is peculiar to themselves, and which is different in kind from the injury sustained by those who use the street for travel only. The injury is not of the same kind, differing in degree only. It is an additional injury, caused by the impairment of an entirely distinct right,—the special right of ingress and egress. The interest of a public in a highway consists wholly in the right of passage, with the incidental right to do all acts necessary to keep it in repair. The owner of land fronting on a highway has an additional interest, which must be regarded as property, and which, when the right to recover has been given by the state, will sustain a claim for compensation. Such an owner, where the street has been laid out or established by his grantor, is a purchaser by implied covenant of the right that the street shall remain open; and the vacation of the street by the municipal authorities will not divest his right to have the space left open as a street. This private right of way as appurtenant to the land is wholly distinct from the public right of passage. Notes to Doraston v. Payne, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. Eq. [8th ed.] 167. Where the street has been established by the municipality, and a part of the land of the adjoining owner has been taken without compensation, except the consequential benefit to the remainder, and he has made expenditures in the faith that the street will remain open, he has a right or privilege which partakes of the nature of property. In Hare, Am. Const. Law, pp. 376, 377, it is said by the learned author: "The whole argument may be summed up in the general proposition that the opening or mapping out by the state or by an individual of land as a street is a pledge that it shall not be closed or appropriated to a different and less beneficial purpose, which cannot be violated without a breach of faith to subsequent purchasers and builders. We may therefore believe that the right of the owner of a shop or dwelling to the use of the adjacent streets, or, at all events, of that on which the building is situated, is, if not an easement or incorporeal hereditament, an incident or appurtenance without which the building would be valueless, and of which he cannot justly be deprived without compensation; or, as the principle was accurately stated in another case, besides the public right of way or passage, there is a private right in the owners of the land on either side, resulting from an implied agreement that the street shall be kept open as a means of transit, and for the unobstructed access of light." Where the part of a street in front of a property is vacated, the owner's right to compensation is conceded, but it is denied unless there is an actual vacation and closing of the part of the street on which the property abuts. It is evident, however, that without the impairment of the owner's outlet in one direction his property may be rendered comparatively worthless by a change in the physical condition of a street. To draw the line between owners who may and owners who may not recover at the point where the deprivation of access is total, is to draw it arbitrarily. The abutting owner's special right in a street as a means of access to his property is not limited to the part of the street on which his property abuts. Such a limitation of the right would deny him compensation if all of the street except the part immediately in front of his property were vacated. His right is the right of access in any direction which the street permits. As affecting this right, no distinction can be drawn between a partial and a total deprivation of access. The impairment of the right is a legal injury, differing in degree only from its total destruction. If the street is vacated on both sides of his property, so as to cut him off from other streets, his means of access is as effectually destroyed as if the entire street were vacated. If the street is vacated on one side only, and his property is left at the end of a cul de sac; if the street is decreased in width, so as to be impassable to vehicles; or if one means of access is taken away by the closing of a back street or alley,—his injury may be less, but the difference is one of degree only. In either case he has sustained a loss by the destruction of an important element in the market value of his property, and he has been injured in a legal sense.

There seems to be but one answer to the questions propounded by the learned president judge of the superior court in his dissenting opinion: "Are we prepared to declare in this case that access to the claimant's properties has not been impaired? Can the court say to these claimants, 'One opening to your properties is sufficient for your purposes; therefore no legal injury has been done to you by closing the other.' Could we say that if their properties fronted on two parallel streets, or were on the corner of two streets, one of which was vacated? Is it not more in accord with sound principles to say that their right of access was not limited by the frontage of their properties, but extended to the two intersecting streets, and that it is for the jury to say whether, under all the circumstances, the claimants have suffered substantial damages in consequence of the closing of one mode of access?" We have the distinct finding by the jury, approved by the court of quarter sessions, that the appellants' special right of access to their properties has been impaired by the vacation of a part of Melon street and that they have sustained a property loss thereby. The act of 1858 provides a remedy for loss occasioned the owner of land in Philadelphia by the opening, widening, or vacation of streets. We do not see how the court could say, as matter of law, that the claimants' means of access to their properties were not seriously impaired, or how it could, on principle, deny them the right to recover for the loss they sustain because their properties did not front on the part of the street which was vacated. All that can be said for or against the right claimed has been so well said in the opinions filed by the learned judges of the superior court that further discussion of the subject is unnecessary. The precise question raised has not been decided in any of our cases, and because of the difference in legislative and constitutional provisions but little aid can be had in its consideration from the decisions in other states; but we believe that the conclusion which we have reached is in harmony with the trend of our decisions and with the weight of authority elsewhere. On principle, the cases under consideration are almost parallel with Mellor v. Philadelphia, 160 Pa. 614, which has been so fully discussed in the opinions filed. Indeed, it is difficult to see how that case can stand as an authority unless these appeals are sustained. In Pennsylvania S. Valley R. Co. v. Walsh, 124 Pa. 544, the property was at the corner of two streets, one of which was obstructed. In Pennsylvania S. Valley R. Co. v. Ziemer, 124 Pa. 560, damages were awarded for injuries to a property fronting on a cross street; and in Snyder v. Lancaster (Pa.) 20 W. N. C. 184, damage were awarded to the owner of a property not fronting on the street opened.

The difficulty in defining the limits where the right to compensation shall end cannot be urged as a valid objection to the claims of the appellants. To entitle the owner of land to recover, the loss must be one which he, as owner, has suffered by reason of the depreciation in value of his land. The basis of his claim for compensation is that his land has been lessened in value, not that he has suffered in common with others, or to a greater extent than others, because of something peculiar to himself. The difficulty in assessing damages is no greater than that which a jury meets in all such cases in ascertaining the extent to which properties in the vicinity have been benefited, and in making assessments therefor. To sustain the right of a claimant to compensation because of the vacation of a street, it must appear that the loss results from the depreciation in value of his land because of the change in the street; and his loss must be direct and proximate, and so obvious and substantial, as to admit of calculation.

As to the failure of the viewers to report specifically that the Philadelphia & Reading Terminal Company was the owner of the land benefited, it is sufficient to say that the report, as a whole, contains enough to supply the want of that formal averment. Reference is made in the report to the general scheme or plan of revision to enable that company to construct its elevated road; the ordinances providing for the same are recited; and it is further stated that, "in the construction of the Philadelphia & Reading Terminal Railroad and its necessary works that company has entered upon and occupied a portion of Ninth street so stricken from the city plan, and also that portion of Melon street which has been stricken from the city plan as aforesaid." In Re Road in South Abington Twp. 109 Pa. 128, it is said: "The presumption is that the requirements of the statutes have been complied with by the viewers, and therefore it is not necessary specially so to state in the report, unless specially required by the acts regulating the subject." In that case it was held that it was not necessary for the report to show that notice had been given to the landowners, or that the viewers had endeavored to obtain releases, or that they had taken into consideration the advantages accruing to the landowners from the opening of the street. It was also presumed that the route of the road was within the jurisdiction. For these reasons, in connection with those stated in the dissenting opinion of the learned president judge of the superior court, we think that the judgments of the court of quarter sessions should have been affirmed.

It was error on the part of the jury to include in their awards damages caused by the vacation of a part of Ninth street. As suggested in the opinion of the superior court, this error may now be corrected by the filing of releases. The judgments are reversed, and the records are remitted to the court of quarter sessions of Philadelphia, with direction to enter judgments for the appellants in the filing of proper releases.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

Re Will of Sutton DAVIS, Deceased.

(120 N. C. 9.)

1. A will jointly executed by husband and wife cannot be proved as the will of both during the lifetime of one of them.

2. As the separate will of the husband, an instrument executed by husband and wife as their joint will may be proved and take effect after his death during the wife's lifetime, and, unless in some way revoked, it may, upon her death, be again probated as to her property mentioned therein.

NOTE.—Probate of joint or mutual will.

- I. Two wills in one instrument.
- II. Right to revoke.
- III. Joint wills to operate on survivor's death.

I. Two wills in one instrument.

This note is intended to present the authorities as to the validity of a joint or mutual will for the purpose of being admitted to probate. This is distinct from questions as to the effect of the will when it has been probated, and from questions of the effect of contracts of the testator with respect to such will.

It is now fully established, in accord with RE DAVIS, that two persons may unite in making a valid will by a single instrument, although some of the cases hold (and this is not inconsistent with the majority of the other decisions) that such a will in order to be valid must be capable of taking effect immediately on the death of any testator so far as it relates to that testator's property, and that the will cannot be upheld if its provisions are such that on the death of one of the testators his testamentary disposition of his property is suspended or in abeyance until the death of the other comaker of the will. But if the will can be given effect on the death of either testator, so far as his property is concerned, it is at once entitled to probate to that extent and may be successively proved as the separate will of each maker.

In order to make a mutual will the instrument or instruments must be executed by both parties under an agreement to make such a disposition of the property of each that the survivor will be entitled to the property of the one first dying, or the disposition of the property must be in the instrument executed by both parties. Driscoll v. Van Den Henden, 17 Jones & S. 508.

The fact that by the same instrument husband and wife devise reciprocally to each other, or, in other words, that it is a mutual will, does not deprive it of validity. The instrument operates as the separate will of whoever dies first. Re Diez, 60 N. Y. 88.

A will jointly executed by two persons, giving all the property to the survivor, is held to be in the nature of two separate and distinct wills which can be proved in favor of the survivor on the death of one of them without revoking it. Lewis v. Scofield, 36 Conn. 452, 68 Am. Dec. 404; Schumaker v. Schmidt, 44 Ala. 454, 4 Am. Rep. 135.

A will in which two persons have united, but which is in effect the separate will of each, is properly admitted to probate on the death of either as the separate will of that person, but if not proved until both are dead it can be probated as the will of both. Betts v. Harper, 39 Ohio St. 641, 48 Am. Rep. 477; Re Raupp, 10 Misc. 800.

Owners of personal property in severalty, who also own real estate as tenants in common, may unite in making their wills and include them in a single instrument by which each bequeaths his own personal property and his own share of the real estate. Such instrument is in effect the separate will of each, and either can revoke his own part of it. Betts v. Harper, 39 Ohio St. 641, 48 Am. Rep. 477.

A conjoint or mutual will is not void as contrary to public policy, and when two or more persons united in such a will it may be proved as the separate will of each. Ex parte Day, 1 Bradf. 478.

A mutual will giving the property to the survivor with bequests, if there should be anything left at the death of the latter, to certain persons, was admitted to probate as the will of the survivor on the latter's death without having made any revocation or alteration of the instrument. Goods of Lovegrove, 2 Swab. & T. 453, 31 L. J. Prob. N. S. 87, 8 Jur. N. S. 442, 6 L. T. N. S. 131.

An instrument by which two sisters "covenant and agree" for the love they bear each other, whichever may be the longest lived shall be the heir of the other, is held, in Evans v. Smith, 23 Ga. 98, 73 Am. Rep. 751, to be a will, and on the death of one of them provable as her will in favor of the survivor.

A mutual or conjoint will executed in a Danish colony according to Danish law by residents of that place is sustained in Ex parte McCormick, 2 Bradf. 199, as the will of the husband, although it was not executed in conformity to New York law.

Under the Roman Dutch law prevailing in the Cape of Good Hope it is held, in Denyseeu v. Mostert, L. R. 4 P. C. 236, 41 L. J. P. C. N. S. 41, 20 Week. Rep. 1017, 8 Moore, P. C. C. N. S. 502, that a mutual will made by husband and wife having community of goods, providing for payments of debts with provision for children and grandchildren and nominating sole and universal heirs, may, after the husband's death, be revoked by the widow so far as it affects her property, and that she may be thus entitled to claim her half of the inheritance as if no will had been made. This case was approved in Dias v. DeLivers, L. R. 5 App. Cas. 123, 49 L. J. P. C. N. S. 26, 42 L. T. N. S. 287. In this latter case it is said that a mutual will is in effect two wills, the disposition of each sharer being applicable to his or her half of the joint property. Therefore, in interpreting such a will it is held that on the death of one of the makers the will as to his share of the property only becomes operative. Therefore, when one of the beneficiaries survived one of the joint makers of the will, but died during the lifetime of the other, it was held that his interest under the gift from the former was vested, but that as to the share of the property of the other maker there was presented the case of the death of the beneficiary before the will took effect.

An instrument signed by two brothers, saying: "In case one of us should die our money shall fall to the one who is living,"—was held to be a double will revocable by both. Re Vogel, 27 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 80.

Where sisters made a joint will bequeathing to the survivor certain property inherited by them 33 L. R. A.

Mr. Charles F. Warren, for appellant:

The script is entitled to probate as the separate will of Sutton Davis.

The court is requested to overrule Clayton v. Liverman, 2 Dev. & B. L. 558.

The opinion of the court is based upon a misconception of Hobson v. Blackburn, 1 Add. Ecll. Rep. 274. The dissenting opinion of Judge Daniel in Clayton v. Liverman presents from a brother, and after the death of the survivor to certain others, and one of them subsequently made a separate will, with an express exception of the former will, disposing of the property inherited from the brother, the executors of the latter on her death were denied probate of that will alone but were given liberty to apply for probate of both wills, reserving the rights of the executors of the former will. Goods of Fletcher, L. R. 11 Ir. Eq. 359. Nothing is said in the report about the death of the other sister.

A will jointly executed by husband and wife is admitted to probate as her will after her death without being revoked. March v. Huyter, 30 Tex. 243.

A will by husband and wife which is declared "to be our last will," and providing that "after the payment of all our just debts and funeral expenses we direct that all our moneys," etc., be used for certain bequests to their children, with an appointment of executors of "this our joint will," and the attestation clause of which describes the will as executed by both, was held, in Goods of Stracey, 1 Deane & S. Ecll. Rep. 8, 1 Jur. N. S. 1177, to be provable as the separate will of each. It was offered after the death of both, but the court said: "The paper should have been proved as the will of Lady Stracey upon her decease, but that cannot affect the right of the executors now."

A will of a married woman duly executed by her and to which her husband's name also is signed was sustained in Myers v. Esquer, 6 Houst. (Del.) 342, where some witnesses testified that he signed it in token of his assent thereto, and one witness testified to an impression that each was making a will in favor of the other.

A joint will of husband and wife to take effect "in case we should be called out of this world at one and the same time and by one and the same accident" was held inoperative where that condition did not happen. Goods of Huzo, L. R. 2 Prob. Div. 73, 46 L. J. Prob. N. S. 21, 36 L. T. N. S. 518, 25 Week. Rep. 396.

Mutual wills of husband and wife executed in separate instruments were in question in Lansing v. Haynes, 95 Mich. 16, but the question decided was that there was an implied revocation of the husband's will growing out of the fact of their divorce and settlement of property interests.

A deposit to the joint account of husband and wife which he makes by transferring his own separate account to the joint account is held to be merely a convenient provision for managing the estate and to leave the property as a part of his estate on his death. Marshall v. Crutwell, L. R. 20 Eq. 328, 44 L. J. Ch. N. S. 504.

A mutual or joint will of husband and wife owning community property directing that the survivor shall pay certain legacies does not, on the death of the husband, make such legacies a legal obligation to the wife, but the conveyance by her to satisfy them will, as to creditors, be deemed voluntary and without consideration. Wyche v. Clapp, 48 Tex. 544.

A will jointly executed by husband and wife, disposing of property of which he was the sole owner, was sustained in Rogers, Appellant, 11 Me. 303, as a valid will of the husband alone. The court says she was a mere cipher in the transaction. An ex-with great force the position that it is the separate will of each devisor. This contention is supported by the currents of authority in the United States and in England.

1 Schouler, Wills, § 456, note 4, §§ 457, 459; Goods of Lovegrove, 81 L. J. Prob. N. S. 87; Betts v. Harper, 39 Ohio St. 639, 48 Am. Rep. 477; Re Diaz, 50 N. Y. 88; Evans v. Smith, 28 Ga. 98, 73 Am. Dec. 751; 1 Redf. Wills, 182, 183; Theobald, Wills, 12; 1 Jarman, Wills, 201, note 81, note 5.

No counsel for appellee.

Faireloth, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On July 27, 1893, Sutton Davis and wife, Henrietta Davis, jointly executed an instrument of writing, regular in all respects, purpression of Lord Mansfield that "there cannot be a joint will," which is said to have been made in the discussion of joint powers, is commented on as follows: "It is true that joint tenants cannot make a will which can operate jointly; for the instant either dies, the principle of survivorship vests the whole estate in the survivor; and if such a will can have any operation in law (and it seems it cannot, 4 Kent, Com. 360) it cannot be as a joint will."

Other cases also hold that a will which is in form the joint will of husband and wife, but which only disposes of property of which he is the sole owner, is sustained as the husband's separate will, and she is held to be a mere cipher in the transaction. Allen v. Allen, 28 Kan. 18; Chaney v. Home Frontier & F. Missionary Soc. 28 Ill. App. 621; Kunnen v. Zurline, 2 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. 440. But in Chaney's Case it appeared that the wife merely signed the will for the purpose of showing her assent to it, and that it was not done in execution of the paper, nor was her signature attested.

An instrument executed by husband and wife was held to be valid as a will in Mosser v. Mosser, 25 Ala. 551, where the property was the separate estate of the wife. The question was as to the nature of the instrument as a deed or will, and not as to its being a joint will.

The ecclesiastical court refused probate of a conjoint or mutual will of three persons leaving property to the "longest life or lives while continuing single," with a provision that it should go, on certain conditions, to their brothers and sisters. The court said: "An instrument of this nature is unknown to the testamentary law of this country; or, in other words, that it is unknown, as a will, to the law of this country at all." It was said, if valid at all, it was as a contract and not as a will, and therefore that court had no jurisdiction. Hobson v. Blackburn, 1 Add. Ecol. Rep. 274.

But it appears in this case that after the death of one of these persons without having altered or revoked his part of the mutual wills probate thereof was in fact granted as to his effects. This appears in the statement of facts, and is not mentioned in the opinion of the court. The offer of the will as a joint will was made after the death of another of the makers who had made a separate later will which was inconsistent with the mutual will, and it was on that offer that the decision was rendered.

This case of Hobson v. Blackburn was misconceived by some of the early cases and taken to be a decision against the validity of a will executed by two or more persons. But the decision, as pointed out in Ex parte Day, 1 Bradf. 478, was based on the fact that the joint will had been revoked by the subsequent separate will of the decedent for whom it was offered for probate, and that it had actually been admitted to probate by the same court as the last will and testament of another maker who died without altering or revoking his part of the mutual will.

II. Right to revoke.

The cases generally agree that either of the co-makers can at any time revoke his part of the will. This is assumed, if not decided, in nearly all the cases on the subject.

But a mutual will of husband and wife jointly executed by them, which is proved by her after the 88 L. R. A. husband's death and the benefits thereof accepted by her, is held, in Dufour v. Pereira, 1 Dick. 419, to be irrevocable because confirmed by her, and she cannot by a subsequent will prevent the operation of the mutual will. The court takes occasion to say in this case that while the will might have been revoked by both jointly or separately, provided notice was given by the one intending to revoke it to the other, "I cannot be of opinion that either of them could, during their joint lives, do it secretly; or that after the death of either, it could be done by the survivor by another will. It is a contract between the parties, which cannot be rescinded but by the consent of both." But inasmuch as there was the effect of the wife's confirmation after the husband's death, the language quoted is in a certain sense obiter.

So, in Kentucky a joint will of husband and wife executing a power given them to dispose of the estate by their last will and testament was held, in Breathitt v. Whittaker, 8 B. Mon. 534, to be beyond the power of the wife to revoke by her separate act. The court declares: "If a joint power is given to two to do a particular act, and the same to revoke at pleasure, both must concur in the revocation."

But most cases hold that there is at all times a power of revocation even if this makes an actionable breach of contract.

The fact that a conjoint or mutual will may constitute an irrevocable compact does not prevent either party from revoking it as a will by a subsequent testament. Ex parte Day, 1 Bradf. 478.

Mutual wills executed pursuant to a contract are not irrevocable in such sense that one of the makers cannot make a subsequent valid will which will be entitled to probate, although the remedy for breach of the agreement may be enforceable in a court of equity. Re Keep, 17 N. Y. S. R. 612, citing Hopper v. Reed, 22 Daily Register, No. 99, October 20, 1897.

A contract that mutual wills shall be unalterable and irrevocable was held valid in Reformed Church v. Wise, 3 Ohio Dec. 567, but in that case, as in many other cases not here considered, the question was as to the contractual liability or its enforcement rather than the right to probate the will.

A double will executed by brother and sister giving to the survivor all the property of the other for life with a remainder to others was involved in Cawley's Estate, 162 Pa. 530. In that case the brother died first. Afterwards the sister made a new will changing the remainderman and executor. After her death the double will was probated but on appeal it was held that this was revoked by her later will.

A joint will made by brothers owning property jointly is properly probated as the separate will of each successively, if they die without any revocation of the instrument. Hill v. Harding, 32 Ky. 76. The court holds that either had the right to revoke the will in so far as it applied to his interest in the property, but that if he did not do so it was valid.

The right of persons who have made mutual wills to revoke them is also declared in Albery v. Sessions, 2 Ohio N. P. 237, although it is held that they may be bound by contract which may be specifically enforced.

It is expressly provided by statute in California porting to be their last will and testament, giving several tracts of land to Fanny Roberson and others and their heirs and assigns. On July 15, 1896, Sutton Davis died. Henrietta is still living. The executor named in the will offered to prove the paper writing as the joint will of the signers, also to prove it as the separate will of Sutton Davis, and to qualify as executor. The clerk refused the motion, and on appeal his honor affirmed the judgment of the clerk. The executor appealed, assigning error: (1) The refusal of the court to declare said writing to be the joint will of Davis and wife; (2) the refusal of the court to declare said writing to be the will of the husband alone, and to order the clerk to qualify him as executor thereof.

This case is somewhat novel, and presents a question which, so far as we have discovered, has not been brought to the attention of this court except in one case: First. Can the paper writing be probated as the joint will of the signing parties? Second. If it cannot, may it be proved as the separate will of the deceased husband? The record fails to disclose whether the property belonged to one or partly to each of the devisors, but we are informed by counsel that some parts of the land belonged to each. We shall assume such to be the fact, as that is the strongest view against the executor. The paper professes in plain language a joint purpose to dispose of the property in a single instrument, and to have one executor. There is no intimation of survivorship on the death of one, or when the devise shall become operative, whether upon the death of one as to his or her part, or upon the death of both as to the whole property. The question, then, must be answered upon these plain words: "We give and bequeath to Fanny Roberson, colored, and her daughter Adelia Roberson, and their heirs and assigns, a certain tract or parcel of land, bounded and described as follows," etc.

We omit from our consideration the first error assigned, for in no view can the instrument be proved as the will of both, the wife now living. If established in any way, it must be as the separate will of the deceased husband. The text-books to which we were referred on this subject treat of joint wills, conjoint wills, compacts, and mutual wills, etc., all of which would fall under the first error assigned. There is nothing from which it can be implied even that there was any agreement that, if one should devise to these devisees, the other would do so, or that, if one should afterwards revoke, the other would do so. Either had the right to do so, and without notice to the other. It is not like the case of a mutual will, in which, after the husband's death, by which event the wife's estate was much increased, she makes another will, and diverts the husband's property from the course intended and agreed upon by them at the execution of the joint will. In such case the probate court was unable to control and prevent the wrong, but a court of equity takes hold on the ground of preventing a fraud. So,

(Cal. Civ. Code, § 1279) that "a conjoint or mutual will is valid, but it may be revoked by any of the testators in like manner with any other will."

Where two sisters under twenty-one years of age made separate wills each in favor of the other, it was held that the marriage of one of them did not revoke the will of the other, although the court deems it a hard case and thinks it might have been the supposition that both wills were made inoperative by the marriage. Hinckley v. Simmons, 4 Ves. Jr. 160.

III. Joint wills to operate on survivor's death.

While declaring that two or more persons may execute a joint will which will operate as if executed separately by each, and will be entitled to and will require a separate probate on the decease of each as his will, the court in one case said: "But if the will so provides, and the disposition of the property requires it, the probate should be delayed until the death of both, or all, of the testators." This is said in Schumaker v. Schmidt, 44 Ala. 454, 34 Am. Rep. 185, but it is obiter and cannot be regarded as supported by the decisions, although there is some intimation in favor of this doctrine in Goods of Raine, infra.

A will jointly executed by two sisters making certain devises and bequests and providing that the residue shall go to the survivor, and that the will shall not be offered for probate until both are dead, is held to be contrary to the policy of the law that every will shall be propounded for probate as soon as may be after the testator's decease. And it cannot be held operative although proved without objection or appeal by the surviving testator. State Bank v. Bliss, 67 Conn. 317.

A will by which husband and wife, who severally own property in their individual right, not only give the property of the one first dying to the survivor but treat the property as a joint fund, making a joint devise of the wife's real property and joint legacies out of the personality of both, without designating the proportion in which the personality of either shall contribute, is an attempt to make a joint will and not a separate will of each, and it is invalid. Walker v. Walker, 14 Ohio St. 157, 82 Am. Dec. 474. Although there were some saving provisions in the will, it was held that the most important ones were joint and the whole will must fail.

A will jointly executed by which two persons give their property, not to the survivor, but to third persons, and appoint an executor "of this our last will and testament," cannot be sustained either as a joint will or as the separate wills of the makers. It cannot be established as a joint will because "if conjoint, then it is either irrevocable except by the act of both—which would deprive each testator of the power of altering his intentions in regard to the disposition of his own property—or it is revocable by the act of either, which would give to one the power of changing the disposition of another's property." And it cannot be established as the separate will of either because it does not purport to be such, but is wholly a joint will. Clayton v. Liverman, 2 Dev. & B. L. 558.

This case is distinguishable in some respects from RM DAVIS, but the court in the latter case seems to intend to overrule the former, and not merely to distinguish it.

A joint will providing that the bequests and devises shall be postponed as regards use and enjoyment until the death of both makers of the instrument, with a reservation of right in the survivor to have the sole control, management, and disposal of all the property during her life, so that all that is subject to the provisions of the will is the balance that may remain undisposed of on the death of the survivor, is invalid. Hershey v. Clark, 36 Ark. 17, 47 Am. Rep. 1, Otting 1 Jarman, Wills, p. 27; Clayton v. Liverman, 2 Dev. & B. L. 558.

But the fact that persons who make separate wills and testaments in the same instrument dethe rights of parties in a court of probate are essentially different from their rights after probate, which are to be administered in another jurisdiction. Then, why may not a husband and wife convey their separate property by will as well as by deed? The irrevocability in the latter case, and the revocability in the former, necessarily so as long as the party lives, can make no difference, because the act must be as valid at the time it is done in the one case as the other. Third parties are interested in contracts (as deeds), whereas no one can acquire any interest in a devise until after the testator's death. We find nothing in the statute of wills in conflict with this view. If each had made a separate will at the same time, giving the same property to the same devisees, there could be no doubt of the validity of each, with the power to revoke at any time. Can the fact that they did so by one joint act change the character of the transaction? The intent of both is equally manifest, and the intent is the controlling element, both in the execution and construction of wills.

In Clayton v. Liverman, 2 Dev. & B. L. 558, the majority of the court held that a will jointly executed by two sisters could not be probated, either as a joint will or as their separate wills. They died within a few days of each other, and the will was not offered for probate until after the death of both. The decision was upon the ground that it was a very singular case, and that such an instrument, as a will, was unknown to the law of this country, and relied upon Hobson v. Blackburn, 1 Add. Eccl. Rep. 274. Daniel, J., in his able dissenting opinion, combats the whole argument of the court, and insists that the court misapprehended the judge's opinion in Hobson v. Blackburn, 1 Add. Eccl. Rep. 274. On a close reading of the case, we think the court did misconceive the question at issue in Hobson's Case, and we approve the conclusion in the dissenting opinion. As the question was so ably discussed in Clayton v. Liverman, 2 Dev. & B. L. 558, we are not disposed to repeat it, but only give the conclusion. We find in the books and cases cited below that the current of opinion in the states is contrary to that in Clayton v. Liverman, 2 Dev. & B. L. 558, and we think the reason and common sense of the question are the same way. 1 Schouler, Wills, § 456, note 4. §§ 457, 459; Goods of Lovegrove, 31 L. J. (1858-1862) Prob. N. S. 87; 1 Redf. Wills, 182, 183; Theobald, Wills, 13; 1 Jarman, Wills, 201, note 31, note 5; Retts v. Harper, 39 Ohio St. 639, 641, 48 Am. Rep. 477; Re Dies, 50 N. Y. 94; Evans v. Smith, 28 Ga. 98, 78 Am. Dec. 751.

Our conclusion is that the instrument offered for probate may be proved now as the separate will of Sutton Davis as to his property described therein, and that, unless in some way revoked, it may, upon the death of his wife, be probated as to her property mentioned therein.

clare that it is "our joint wish and will" does not make the will invalid. Re Raupp, 10 Misc. 800.

But a will made by brothers who were partners in farming business and joint tenants, by which they declare they make "this our last will and testament," and say: "We give and bequeath" certain property to a nephew, is held, in Goods of Raine, 1 Swab. & T. 144, to be such an instrument as cannot be probated during the life of either brother. The court distinguishes it from Hobson v. Blackburn, 1 Add. Eccl. Rep. 274, and Goods of Stracey, 1 Deane & S. Eccl. Rep. 6, 1 Jur. N. S. 1177, and says: "Two persons profess to make their will, and neither gives anything without the other; and the instrument is to have no effect until after the death of both," adding in conclusion: "I cannot grant probate of this paper during the life of either." This intimates that it might be probated on the death of both makers, but does not say so.

Raine's Case is disapproved and declared inconsistent with the other authorities in Goods of Miskelly, 4 Ir. Eq. Rep. 62, 18 Week. Rep. 215, where a joint will of brothers who were joint tenants of a freehold and carried on a farming business jointly was offered for probate as the will of one of them while the other was living. The will disposed of no property except the freehold, but it was held entitled to probate on the ground that it appointed executors, and that a will appointing executors is, without more, entitled to probate.

In Goods of Powell, 15 L. T. 323, a will of husband and wife of their joint interest in a farm to a son was held invalid and probate refused on the husband's death.

A contract or settlement in contemplation of marriage to which was subsequently added what was called on the face of it a codicil was offered for 38 L. R. A.

probate in Goods of Stoddard, 2 Swab. & T. 356, 31 L. J. Prob. N. S. 195. The document was made by the parties in Scotland, but was offered in England in which they subsequently became domiciled. The court refused to grant probate thereof, saying: "You don't show me that the document of which you ask probate would be a good testament according to Scotch law."

The note of a recent case (Goods of Smyth, 104 L. T. N. S. 32) says probate on husband's death was allowed of will in which wife joined giving property to survivor with further provision if survivor should not alter it.

A review of the authorities shows it to be well established now that a single instrument may include the wills of several persons if its provisions are such as to constitute or include a separate will for each of them. As to instruments which attempt to make a joint disposition of property there is more difficulty. But a majority of the cases seems to agree in holding that a will cannot be made by two or more persons unless it can be regarded as the separate will of each of them so that it may be probated separately for each without regard to the fact that another maker is still living.

Contracts of mutual wills have been considered in many cases which are not here discussed or collected, as the question in those cases is altogether different from that of the right to probate a joint will actually executed. The same may be said of many cases involving the effect of mutual wills separately executed as in Lord Walpole v. Lord Orford, 3 Ves. Jr. 402. Some questions arise as to the contractual nature of those instruments, but except so far as the cases relate to the right to probate such a will as distinguished from its binding effect they are not here considered. RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

Peter CARR

v.

(.....R. L.....)

A statute authorizing administration upon the estate of a person who has left home and not been heard from for seven years is unconstitutional, since the administration upon the estate of a living person deprives him of property contrary to the law of the land or without due process of law.

(July 26, 1897.)

ON DEMURRER to answer in an action brought to recover money which had come into defendant's hands through administration proceedings upon the estate of plaintiff during his absence from home. Demurrer sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. B. Crafts, for plaintiff:

The appointment of administrator on the estate of a live person is null and void.

Mr. Nathan B. Lewis, for defendants:

At common law administration granted on the estate of a living person was wholly void. Our statute makes two exceptions to the general rule. One is in case of a person convicted of crime and sentenced to a term of imprisonment of not less than seven years. The other exception is where a person has been absent from his home or place of domicile and unheard of for a period of seven years.

Such absence raises a presumption of death.

The statute is founded in the principles of the highest justice; for it is more reasonable for one to suffer loss who has neglected, shirked, and avoided the natural and ordinary obligations of a kinsman or the more definite duties of a debtor, rather than innocent persons who have acted in good faith toward him.

Administration of an estate is a proceeding in rem.

Administration of an estate by the court of probate cannot be attacked collaterally, for, although courts of probate are courts of limited jurisdiction, yet their jurisdiction to grant administration is general and exclusive within their respective limits.

Tillinghast, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of assumpsit to recover money which came to the hands of the defendants from the plaintiff's estate, which has been administered upon during his lifetime. The defendants have filed special pleas in bar, in which they set up that more than seven years before letters of administration were taken out on plaintiff's estate he had left his home in South Kingstown, where he was a domiciled inhabitant, and that during all of said time he had not been heard from, either directly or indirectly; that notice of intention to apply for letters of administration by Bridget McGuire, a sister of the plaintiff, was given for the period of three months; that further notice by publication was afterwards ordered and given by the probate court, and that thereupon, upon proof to the satisfaction of said court that notice had been given for three months as aforesaid, and also that said additional notice had been given as ordered, it was adjudged that the petition be granted; and the defendant John A. Brown was thereupon appointed administrator on the estate of the plaintiff. The pleas further set up that said Brown thereupon proceeded to administer upon said estate in the usual way; that he settled his account with the probate court; and thereupon, after three years from the time when said administration was granted, he distributed said estate according to law. Wherefor he pays judgment, etc. To these pleas the plaintiff demurs on the grounds: (1) That the proceedings in the court of probate, recited in said pleas, were and are null and void, as the plaintiff was then and now is living; (2) that to take and appropriate the estate of a living person, in the manner described in said pleas, would be to take private property without due process of law, and such a construction of the statute would be contrary to the Constitution of this state; (3) that said court of probate acquired no jurisdiction of the plaintiff's personal property and estate.

The action of the probate court, and the proceedings in connection therewith, were had in pursuance of R. I. Pub. Laws 1882-85, chap. 298, which is as follows: "Whenever it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the court of probate of any town that any person domiciled in such town at the time of his departure, has left his home and not been heard from directly or indirectly for the term of seven years, and that a notice of intention to apply for letters of administration or to prove the last will and testament of such person has been published for three months in each issue of some newspaper in the city of Providence, and also in each issue of some newspaper in the county in which he was domiciled, and been posted for three months in three or more public places in said town, and that such other notice as the court may deem best has been given to the relations and heirs, the last will and testament of such person may be proved and letters of administration may be granted on such person's estate as if he were dead. The notices shall contain a brief description of such person, his age, name, and such other characteristics as shall identify him, and no distribution of his estate shall be made until three years after administration has been granted under the provisions of this section." R. I. Pub. Stat. chap. 184, § 9, which is a continuation of the same subject, is as follows: "If such person shall afterwards return to this state, or shall constitute an agent or attorney to act in his behalf, the executor or administrator as aforesaid shall be accountable for, and shall deliver to such person or his lawful agent or attorney, all the estate of every kind which shall then be in his hands as executor or administrator as aforesaid, after deducting such sum or sums as the court of probate shall allow, in the settlement of his accounts, for any payments or disbursements which he may have legally made in his said capacity, or which such court of probate may think reasonable to allow for his personal trouble in executing the trust of executor or administrator as aforesaid." Although statutes of similar import have existed in this state for more than a century, no case of this sort has ever before arisen thereunder, so far as we are aware: and we are therefore called upon to decide the question raised without the aid of former adjudications, so far as our own state is concerned. For, although said statute was before the court in Southwick v. Middle-town Probate Court, 18 R. I. 402, yet it was only in connection with the question of the sufficiency of the notice to prove the will in question, and hence the decision in that case, has no bearing upon the question as to the constitutionality of the law. It will be observed that said statute does not require the probate court to find that the person whose estate is sought to be administered is dead before proceeding to exercise jurisdiction, but only that he had been absent from his home without being heard from, directly or indirectly, for the period of seven years. This fact being made to appear, the court is given jurisdiction, after the required notice is given, to proceed as if the person were dead. The main question which is raised, then, is whether the general assembly has power to pass an act authorizing the estate of a living person to be administered upon as if he were dead. We think it is very clear, both upon reason and authority, that it does not have this power. To administer upon a person's estate while he is still living is to deprive him of property contrary to the law of the land, or, as it is ordinarily said, without due process of law; and hence is in violation of article 1, § 10, of the Constitution of this state, and also of article 14 of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States. What is due process of law, within the meaning of constitutional provisions like these, has been many times expounded by the Supreme Court of the United States, and also by the highest courts of the various states; and the result of these interpretations may be briefly summed up by saying that the words "due process of law" mean a course of legal proceedings according to those rules and principles which have been established in our systems of jurisprudence for the protection and enforcement of private rights. Pennoy v. Neff, 95 U. S. 783, 24 L. ed. 573. Those rules require that there shall be a court of competent jurisdiction to pass upon the subject-matter of the suit or proceeding, and that there shall be a trial or proceeding in which the rights of the parties, after notice and opportunity to be heard, shall be duly adjudicated. The words "due process of law in this place," as said in Lavin v. Emigrant Industrial Sav. Bank, 18 Blatchf. 23, 1 Fed. Rep. 641, "cannot mean less than a prosecution or suit instituted and conducted according to the prescribed forms and solemnities for ascertaining guilt or determining the title to property. It will be seen that the same measure of protection against legislative encroachment is extended to life, liberty, and property; and, if the latter can be taken without a forensic trial and judgment, there is no security for the others. If the legislature can take the property of A and transfer it to B, they can take A himself and either shut him up in prison or put him to death. But none of these things can be done by mere legislation. There must be 'due process of law.'" The following terse exposition of this constitutional guaranty is furnished by the supreme court of New York in the case of Taylor v. Porter, 4 Hill, 145, 40 Am. Dec. 274. Mr. Justice Bronson there says: "The words 'by the law of the land,' as here used [i. e. in the state Constitution], do not mean a statute passed for the purpose of working the wrong. That construction would render the restriction absolutely nugatory, and turn this part of the Constitution into mere nonsense. The people would be made to say to the two houses, 'You shall be vested with 'the legislative power of the state,' but no one 'shall be disfranchised, or deprived of any of the rights or privileges' of a citizen, unless you pass a statute for that purpose;' [in other words: 'You shall not do the wrong, unless you choose to do it.'" See also, United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 554, 23 L. ed. 592; Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 92, 23 L. ed. 679; Doyld's Petition, 16 R. I. 538, 5 L. R. A. 859; Cross v. Brown, 19 R. I. —; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 431; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 43 et seq. Tested by these rules, the statute aforesaid, under which a man's property may be taken without his knowledge or consent, and in a proceeding to which he is not a party, and of which he has no notice, must be held to be clearly violative both of his constitutional and also of his common-law right. Indeed, the whole proceeding, so far as he is concerned, is res inter alios acta.

In Lavin v. Emigrant Industrial Sav. Bank, 18 Blatchf. 28, 1 Fed. Rep. 641, which was a case where the original letters of administration were issued by the court of probate of Cranston, in this state, under the statute in question, and where afterwards ancillary letters of administration were taken out in New York, the court, after holding that the payment by the defendant bank to said administrator there was no defense to the suit, said: "It is also claimed that, if the New York letters are void, the payment to the administrator may be justified under the Rhode Island letters, on the principle that, though a foreign administrator cannot sue here without obtaining ancillary letters, yet a payment to him is a good payment and discharges the debt. Parsons v. Lyman, 20 N. Y. 108. But it is clear that the Rhode Island letters have no greater validity than the New York letters. The Rhode Island statute undertakes to do directly what the New York statute aims to accomplish by the more indirect method of declaring a judicial decision conclusive against a person not a party to it. In Rhode Island the court does not go through the form of deciding that the person is dead, but, conceding that he is only absent, distributes his estate 'as if he were dead,' without the service of any notice or process upon him whatever. I do not see how any respectable argument can be made, that this is not depriving him of his property without due process of law, or how it can be necessary, or reasonably proper, for the proper government of the persons and the property within the jurisdiction of the state." This decision is cited with approval by the Supreme Court of the United States in Scott v. McNeal, 154 U. S. 49, 38 L. ed. 902.

The general question as to whether any court has, or can have, jurisdiction to grant letters of administration on the estate of a living person has been much discussed, and, while the authorities are not entirely harmonious, yet the great weight thereof is clearly against the existence of any such jurisdiction. The ground upon which most of the decisions rest is that, in order to confer jurisdiction upon a court to grant letters of administration upon a person's estate, that person must be in fact dead; and that, if he is not dead, there is no estate to administer upon, and hence no jurisdiction. Mr. Freeman, in discussing this question in his work on Judgments, says: "The question occasionally arises whether the grant of letters testamentary or of administration on the estate of a person in fact living, but supposed to be dead, is an act beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and therefore so utterly void that no person is protected in dealing with the executor or administrator while his letters remain unrevoked. The weight of authority is very decidedly to the effect that the decease of the supposed decedent is a prerequisite to the jurisdiction of the court, and that he is wholly unaffected by the proceedings for the settlement of his estate." In line with the doctrine here announced, it is said in Melia v. Simmons, 45 Wis. 384, 30 Am. Rep. 746: "The proceedings of administration, settlement, and assignment of the estate of the respondent, represented to have been dead, when he was and is still alive, are absolutely null and void, for all purposes whatsoever."

The county court of Dodge county, or any other court, had no jurisdiction in this particular case, or in such a class of cases. There is no class of cases which embraces the administration of the estates of living persons as if they were dead. The proceedings are void ab initio and throughout. If this case falls within any class of cases, it is a class in which no court has any right to deliberate, or render any judgment, and in which every conceivable act is an absolute nullity. The only jurisdiction the county court has, in respect to the administration of estates, is over the estates of dead persons. It would seem that the bare statement of such a proposition is enough, without citing authorities." In Thomas v. People, Joiner, 107 Ill. 521, 47 Am. Rep. 458, the supreme court of Illinois, in an able opinion by Mr. Justice Mulkey, takes the same view. The same doctrine has been either adjudged or recognized in Massachusetts in Jochumsen v. Suffolk Sav. Bank, 3 Allen, 87; Waters v. Stickney, 12 Allen, 1, 18, 90 Am. Dec. 128; Day v. Floyd, 130 Mass. 488; in Pennsylvania, in a series of cases beginning in 1824 (see Devlin v. Com. 101 Pa. 278, 47 Am. Rep. 710); in Texas, in Withers v. Patterson, 27 Tex. 499, 85 Am. Dec. 643; in Kentucky, in French v. Frazier, 7 J. J. Marsh. 426; in Tennessee, in D'Arment v. Jones, 4 Lea, 251, 40 Am. Rep. 12; in New Hampshire, in Morgan v. Dodge, 44 N. H. 255, 82 Am. Dec. 218; in North Carolina, in State v. White, 7 Ired. L. 116; in Alabama, in Duncan v. Stewart, 25 Ala. 408, 60 Am. Dec. 527; in California, in Stevenson v. San Francisco City and County Super. Ct. 62 Cal. 60; in Missouri, in Johnson v. Beasley, 65 Mo. 264, 27 Am. Rep. 276; and in many other states. See also, 1 Woerner, American Law of Administration, §§ 208 et seq., where the same view is taken, and our statute commented on; and note to Bolton v. Schrieffer, 18 L. R. A. 242, 135 N. Y. 65. To this array of authorities there are to be added the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in Griffith v. Frazier, 12 U. S. 8 Cranch, 9, 3 L. ed. 471, and the recent case of Scott v. McNeal, 154 U. S. 49, 38 L. ed. 902, in which last-named case Gray, J., in an exhaustive and learned opinion, after discussing the entire subject, and reviewing all the cases, comes to the conclusion that administration cannot legally be granted on the estate of a living person, and that to deprive one of his property in a proceeding of this sort is unconstitutional. The reasoning in that case is so cogent, and the result so authoritative, especially as to the constitutional question involved in the case at bar, that further citations would seem to be unnecessary.

Opposed to all this there is practically, so far as we are aware, but the single case of Roderigas v. East River Sav. Inst. 63 N. Y. 460, 20 Am. Rep. 555, where the court, by a bare majority, held that, under the provisions of the statutes of that state conferring upon surrogates jurisdiction over the subject of granting letters of administration, the inquiry of the surrogate as to the death of the person upon whose estate administration is applied for is judicial in its nature, and that the surrogate has jurisdiction to determine it upon sufficient evidence; and also that letters issued by him upon due proofs are conclusive evidence of the authority of the administrator to act until the order granting them is reversed on appeal, or the letters are revoked or vacated, so far, at least, as to protect innocent persons acting upon the faith thereof. The decision in that case has been much criticised (see articles in 21 Alb. L. J. pp. 65, 84; D'Arment v. Jones, 4 Lea, 251, 40 Am. Rep. 12; 15 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 212; 1 Woerner, American Law of Administration, § 210), and, so far as we are aware, has never been followed outside of said state except in the case of Scott v. McNeal, in Washington territory, which, as we have already seen, has since been expressly overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States, although it was cited with approval in Plumo v. Howard Sav. Inst. 46 N. J. L. 230. In that case, however, it was not even surmised that the alleged decedent was not in fact dead. We are not unmindful of the rule that has been laid down in this state and elsewhere that the court should ponder well before declaring an act of the general assembly to be unconstitutional, and that it should resolve every doubt in favor of the validity of the act. State v. District of Narragansett, 16 R. I. 440, 3 L. R. A. 295. But if, having observed this rule, the court comes to the conclusion that the act is violative of some constitutional right, its plain and imperative duty is to declare it to be void. Taylor v. Place, 4 R. I. 364. The case was originally heard by the appellate division, which then consisted of three justices. Owing to the importance of the question, however, and in view of the fact before referred to that said statute has long been upon the statute book, it was thought proper to have the case resubmitted on briefs to the entire court, which has been done. And, after a full and careful consideration, we are all of the opinion that, in so far as said statute authorizes the estate of a living person to be administered upon, it is unconstitutional and void. We do not wish to be understood, in what we have said in this case, as expressing any opinion upon the validity of the statute which authorizes administration upon the estates of persons under imprisonment for crime.

Demurrer sustained, and case remitted to the common pleas division for further proceedings.

METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

(..... R. I.)

1. Statements by an applicant for insurance are warranties, where by the terms of the policy he warrants the answers strictly true and agrees that they shall form a part of the contract and that any untrue answer will render the policy void.
2. The burden of proving the truth of answers by an applicant for life insurance which are by the contract made warranties, rests upon the one seeking to recover the policy, although the burden may be lifted as to matters which only affect the right of action by the presumption in favor of honesty and against fraud until something appears to rebut it.

(September 16, 1905.)

APPLICATION by defendant for a new trial after verdict in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of life insurance. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Samuel R. Honey, J. Stacey Brown, and Frank F. Nolan for plaintiff.
Messrs. Andrew J. Jennings, James M. Morton, Jr., and Michael W. Callaghan for defendant.

Stiness, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By the terms of the policies of insurance issued by the defendant, the answers and statements in the printed and written applications for the policies are made a part of the contract. The applicant declares and warrants that the representations and answers made are strictly correct, and wholly true; that they shall form the basis and become part of the contract of insurance, if any be issued; and that any untrue answer will render the policy void. Whether statements which obviously cannot lie within the knowledge of the applicant, and which both parties must know are to be given upon information and belief, must be taken to be warranties, is a question which we need not decide; but that the above provisions constitute a warranty of the truth of the statements in the application, so far as they rest upon the applicant's own knowledge, is beyond question. Wilson v. Conway F. Ins. Co. 4 R. I. 141; Lyons v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 14 R. I. 109, 51 Am. Rep. 864; Jerrett v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. 18 R. I. 754; McCoy v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 133 Mass. 82; Cobb v. Covenant Mut. Ben. Assn. 153 Mass. 176, 10 L. R. A. 666; Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. McTague, 49 N. J. L. 587, 60 Am. Rep. 661. Without multiplying citations, we quote the language of Mr. Justice Hunt in Jeffries v. Economical Mut. Ins. Co. 89 U. S. 23 Wall. 47, 22 L. ed. 833, "Many cases may be found which hold, that where false answers are made to inquiries which do not relate to the risk, the policy is not necessarily avoided, unless they influenced the mind of the company, and that whether they are material is for the determination of the jury. But we know of no respectable authority which so holds, where it is expressly covenanted as a condition of liability that the statements and declarations made in the application are true, and when the truth of such statements forms the basis of the contract." The statements in question in this case being warranties, we are called upon to decide whether the trial judge correctly charged the jury that the burden of proof was upon the defendant to show the falsity of any answer set up in defense. There are many cases which lay down this rule upon the principle that the burden of proving an issue is upon the party who raises it. Spencer v. Citizens' Mut. L. Ins. Assn. 142 N. Y. 505; Russell v. Fidelity & F. Ins. Co. 84 Iowa, 98; Sutherland v. Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. 87 Iowa, 505; Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Rogers, 119 Ill. 474, 59 Am. Rep. 810 Mowry v. Home L. Ins. Co. 9 R. I. 846, appears to be to the same effect, but that case related to the value of the plaintiff's insurable interest in the life of an uncle, for which he had taken a policy. The charge to the jury was that the plaintiff must show that he had an insurable interest in the life of the deceased, but, as the value of such interest was a matter of opinion and estimate, the burden was on the defendant to show that the alleged indebtedness and business relations out of which the interest sprung were no foundation for the estimate of the plaintiff, and the large amount of insurance obtained. Cases like those cited above rest upon a current principle when it is applied to defenses set up outside of the terms of the contract. But they leave out of view another equally correct and more pertinent principle—that a party cannot recover upon a conditional contract until he shows that he has complied with the conditions. To depart from this principle would be to make a new contract for the parties. The rule of law is well stated by Ames, Ch. J., in Wilson v. Hampden F. Ins. Co. 4 R. I. 159, as follows: "It is clear, however, upon principle, to use the words of Mr. Justice Washington, in Craig v. United States Ins. Co. Pet. C. C. 410, that where the assured has entered into a warranty, he cannot recover against the underwriters without first averring and proving performance of these stipulations; and see 2 Phillips, Ins. 2d ed. 753; 2 Arnould, Ins. 1235, 1262. The burden of proving the performance of all warranties made by him rests upon the assured, and although this burden may be lifted by presumption merely, as in case of the implied warranty of seaworthiness it is held to be, yet this cannot shift the burden, which remains, notwithstanding the prima facie case thus made out by the plaintiff, where the law first casts it, to the end of the trial." We think that this case lays down the correct rule. It is the rule which applies to all contracts, and a policy of insurance is a contract. Rules of evidence, however, involving only the mode of procedure in a case, must be largely within the discretion of the court, in order to be practicable; and so many things are allowed to go by presumption, or with slight proof, to make a prima facie case, until something appears to controvert it. But this rule of convenience does not relieve a party from any of the obligations of his contract. Thus it has become common in suits on promissory notes simply to produce the note to make out a prima facie case; the presumption of signature, consideration, and other incidents following. The same presumptions are usually admitted with reference to a deed, and other like cases are readily conceived. When a man solemnly executes a paper upon which he is to base a contract, there is a natural presumption that what he says in it is true, in the absence of anything to contradict it. Rules of evidence are made to facilitate the trial of cases, and not to render a trial impossible; and many of the answers required, which lie peculiarly within the knowledge of the applicant himself, it would be unduly burdensome, if not quite impossible, for another to prove, after the applicant is dead. Some relate to ancestors and relatives, their ages and diseases; others to his own diseases, from childhood up. Now, while some of these, at any rate, may be warranties, it would be a great hardship to require full evidence of the truth of every answer, affirmative and negative, when many of them may not be in dispute at all. They may be sustained prima facie by the presumption of truth which attaches to a man's solemn acts and declarations in the course of a contract. "On the other hand," said Mr. Justice Miller, in Piedmont & A. Life Ins. Co. v. Ewing, 92 U. S. 377, 23 L. ed. 610, "it is no hardship that, if the insurer knows or believes any of these statements to be false, he shall furnish the evidence on which that knowledge or belief rests. He can thus single out the answer whose truth he proposes to contest; and, if he has any reasonable grounds to make such an issue, he can show the facts on which it is founded." This states a reasonable rule of procedure. The plaintiff must prove certain essential facts, like the issue of the policy, payment of premiums, death of the assured, notice as required, and the general performance of conditions; but to say, because answers are warranties, that the truth of every one must be proved by witnesses before recovery, as claimed by the defendant, would be manifestly unreasonable. Judge Miller pertinently asks, How can it be proved that a man who has lived forty or fifty years has never had dyspepsia or diarrhoea? In the case just cited he also said that the answers were warranties, but that the burden of proving them to be false was upon the defendant. We cannot agree with the last proposition. Notwithstanding our high respect for his decisions, we prefer his reasoning to his conclusion.

Judge Gray said, in McLoon v. Commercial Mut. Ins. Co. 100 Mass. 473, 1 Am. Rep. 129, "The nature and form of the warranty may affect the amount of evidence to be required of the plaintiff in the first instance; but whether the terms used are affirmative or negative, the warranty is equally a condition precedent, performance of which must be proved by the plaintiff in order to maintain an action on the policy."

Properly analyzed, Mowry v. Home L. Ins. Co. 9 R. I. 846, is not opposed to the view which we have taken. The charge of the trial judge, which was sustained, laid down the rule that the plaintiff must show that he had an insurable interest in the life of his uncle; that this would not be sustained by showing claims which were a mere pretext for insurance; but, as the value of the interest was a matter of estimate and opinion (which could not, therefore, have been understood by the company to be an absolute statement), the burden of showing that his estimate was fraudulent was upon the defendant.

While we are aware that there are many cases, as we have said above, which put the burden of proving the falsity of a warranty in insurance cases upon the defendant, we cannot follow them, because we believe such a rule to be contrary to the well-established law in regard to warranties in other cases. Doubtless, in some of them confusion has arisen from the rule in regard to the warranties of quality, etc., in cases of the sale of property. But, as pointed out by Shaw, Ch. J., in Dorr v. Fisher, 1 Cush. 271, this is a collateral stipulation, which does not prevent the vesting of title, nor the right to sue for the purchase money, because the contract is completed. The purchaser can sue for a breach of the warranty, and the burden would be upon him. To avoid circuity of action, he is allowed to set it up in defense under the same burden. But this rule does not apply to a warranty which is made a part of the contract. Wilson v. Hampden F. Ins. Co. 4 R. L. 159. To put the burden on the defendant practically reduces the warranty to a representation, and so modifies the contract of the parties. However much a court may disapprove of the form of a contract, it has no right to change it. In other cases the rule has, doubtless, been stated with the same meaning which we have indicated above, viz., that the defendant must first offer proof of the falsity of answers which are attacked. See Crowninshield v. Crowninshield, 2 Gray, 524.

Our conclusion is that the answers in the application are to be taken as warranties; that the burden of proving their truth rests upon the plaintiff, and that this burden may be lifted, not shifted, as to matters which only remotely affect the right of action, by the presumption in favor of honesty and against fraud until something appears to rebut it.

The answers objected to in this case related to the extent of use of intoxicating liquors by the deceased and to hemorrhages. The burden is upon the plaintiff to prove their truth, if they are attacked; and, as the jury were instructed to the contrary, a new trial must be granted.

GLOBE MILLING & REDUCTION COMPANY.

(.....R. L.....)

1. A contract to offer stock to a corporation at the lowest price at which the NOTE.—For restrictions on the transfer of shares of stock by by-laws or articles of association, see note to New England Trust Co. v. Abbott (Mass.) 27 88 L. R. A.

holder is willing to sell before offering it to any other purchaser is not binding in favor of the corporation when it was made by proposed stockholders before the corporation was in existence as a legal entity.

2. A corporation cannot enforce a contract between proposed incorporators to the effect that they will not transfer their stock without giving the option of purchase to the corporation, but the remedy, if any, for breach of the contract would be a personal one against the offending stockholder.

3. The mere issue of certificates of stock by a corporation does not amount to a ratification by it of a contract made before it came into existence between the proposed incorporators to the effect that they would not transfer their shares without giving the company an option to purchase them.

(July 12, 1897.)

ACTION to recover damages for the refusal of defendant to permit a transfer upon its books of certain shares of its stock. On demurrer to additional pleas to the declaration. Ruling in plaintiff's favor.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William H. Sweetland, for plaintiff:

The defendant corporation cannot deprive the transferee of stock in said corporation of the right to have transfer recorded and new certificate issued to him by reason of any agreement between prospective holders of stock in said corporation.

Such agreements are in restraint of trade and because all such agreements must have more than mutual promises to support them, there must be a special consideration paid to the promisor by the promisee.

Fisher v. Bush, 35 Hun, 641.

At most they are only personal agreements permitting an action for damages by the other incorporators against Stearns, if Stearns has violated them, but are not agreements that can be taken advantage of by the corporation, when formed, to deprive this plaintiff of the right to have transfer to him recorded.

Carmony v. Powers, 60 Mich. 26.

A corporation is not responsible for acts, nor bound by contracts, of its promoters, done or entered into before incorporation.

4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 201.

In so far as the first plea alleges an agreement with the corporation, it cannot avail the defendant, because, at the time alleged the defendant had no power to make the alleged agreement, under the provisions of the statute permitting its creation.

Me. Rev. Stat. chap. 48, § 19.

Whatever be the mode prescribed by the act, substantial compliance with all the provisions of it is required before the corporation can be said to be in esse.

Signers of certificates of formation do not become a body politic and corporate by making the certificates. It is only upon the reception of a license issued by the clerk of court as provided by the act, that they have a corporate existence. Any agreement between such parties is not binding on the corporation when formed.

Stowe v. Flagg, 72 Ill. 397; Western Screw & Mfg. Co. v. Cousley, 72 Ill. 531; Unity Ins. Co. v. Cram, 48 N. H. 636; Carmodity v. Powers, 60 Mich. 26.

A corporation cannot adopt or ratify a contract made before its incorporation.

The act of the corporation in adopting such engagements is not a ratification which relates back to the date of making of the contract by the promoters, but is in legal effect the making of a contract as of the date of the adoption.

McArthur v. Times Printing Co. 48 Minn. 319; Battelle v. Northwestern Cement & C. Pavement Co. 37 Minn. 89.

The mere act of the officers of the corporation in issuing the certificates of stock to Stearns was not a ratification.

Chicago City R. Co. v. Allerton, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 233, 21 L. ed. 902.

The laws of the state of Maine under which the defendant corporation was organized contain no provision authorizing the restriction upon the transferability of shares of stock in the manner provided in the agreement in defendant's plea alleged, and such agreement if made cannot affect the plaintiff's right.

Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 164.

The stock issued by defendant corporation was not subject to the agreement in defendant's plea alleged unless said agreement restricting its transferability was expressed in the stock certificates issued by said company.

New England Trust Co. v. Abbott, 162 Mass. 148, 27 L. R. A. 271.

The agreement in defendant's plea alleged does not affect the right of plaintiff to have the transfer of stock to him recorded upon the books of the corporation, and to have new certificate of stock issued to him.

When there has been a fraudulent issue of stock certificates the bona fide holder of such certificates has a right to rely upon the certificates as securing to them the stock which they represented.

though fraudulently issued in the hands of the transferee.

Allen v. South Boston R. Co. 150 Mass. 200, 5 L. R. A. 716.

Messrs. Warren R. Perce and Irving Champlin for defendant.

Tillinghast, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the opinion heretofore given in this case it was held that the by-law of the defendant corporation providing for the right of preemption of the stock in question was invalid. Since the rendition of that opinion the defendant, by leave of court, has filed additional pleas, setting up that by virtue of an agreement entered into on July 27, 1892, between the subscribers to the stock of the then proposed corporation, and also of an agreement between said subscribers and the corporation on August 10, 1892, the stock in question could not be transferred without first giving to the corporation the option of purchase. Without referring to the voluminous pleadings in detail, it is sufficient to say that the main question now raised thereby is whether the alleged agreements had the effect to bind the plaintiff's vendor, William R. Stearns, who was one of said subscribers, to offer the stock in question to the defendant corporation at the lowest price at which he was willing to sell, before selling said stock to the plaintiff. The case shows that, although the defendant corporation was organized at Saco, Maine, on the 10th of August, 1892, under the laws of the state of Maine (see chapter 48, §§ 16-19, printed in connection with our former opinion), as alleged in defendant's pleas, yet that it did not become a corporation, so as to be able to transact business, until the 31st of August, 1892, at which time the certificate required by § 19 of said chapter was filed with the secretary of state. And, this being so, we fail to see any force in the alleged contract with the corporation prior to that time. In other words, the contract or agreement set up by defendant was made before the corporation was in existence as a legal entity. And it is hardly necessary to argue against the power of a person not in being (if, indeed, there can properly be said to be such a person) to make a contract. A corporation like the defendant is purely a creature of statute, and only exists, for the transaction of business, when all of the requirements prescribed for the creation thereof have been complied with. In Thomp. Corp. § 480, the learned author says: "The corporation must have a full and complete organization and existence as a legal entity, before it can enter into any kind of a contract or transact any business." In Gent v. Manufacturers' & M. Mut. Ins. Co. 107 Ill. 658, the court says: "That a corporation should have a full and complete organization and existence as an entity before it can enter into any kind of a contract or transact any business, would seem to be self-evident. This is unconditionally true, unless the act of incorporation authorizes the corporators to perform acts and enter into contracts to bind the company when it shall be organized. As well say a child in ventre sa mère may enter into a contract, or that its parents may bind it by contract. A corporation, until organized, has no being, franchises, or facilities. For do those engaged in bringing it into being have any power to bind it by contract, unless so authorized by the charter." The supreme court of Maine has expressly decided that a corporation like the defendant does not become a corporation until the certificate of the attorney general be obtained as required by the provisions of said chapter 48, § 19, of the Revised Statutes of that state. Richmond Factory Assn. v. Clarke, 61 Me. 351. See also Providence Albertype Co. v. Kent & S. Co. 19 R. I. 56; Utley v. Union Tool Co. 11 Gray, 141; Penn Match Co. v. Hapgood, 141 Mass. 148; 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 197-199. It is to be observed, in this connection, that there is a manifest difference, as to the effect of omission of the requirements of the law in the organization of corporations, between a case where the corporation is created by special charter and there have been acts of user, and a case where individuals seek to form themselves into a corporation under provisions of the general law. In the latter case—which is the one before us—it is only in pursuance of the provisions of the statutes for such purposes that corporate existence can be acquired. Bigelow v. Gregory, 73 Ill. 197. But defendant contends that the case presented is not that of an agreement between the promoters of a corporation and other parties, but is that of an agreement between the incorporators themselves. But, suppose it is, how does that change the case? It is then only a contract between the incorporators, or rather the proposed incorporators, individually, and not one of which the defendant can avail itself. And therefore, even assuming that a contract between said proposed incorporators not to transfer their stock, when obtained, without giving the option of purchase to the corporation, would be binding on them as individuals, yet the only remedy for a breach of such contract would be a personal one against the offending stockholder. Thus in Carmody v. Powers, 60 Mich. 30, it is held that an agreement with individuals that when they become incorporated they will give plaintiff a certain amount of paid up stock, cannot, on any rule of law, be considered as a dealing with the corporation itself, or as one which would bind the future corporation when organized. The case of Vanorndt v. Middlesex County Bank, 26 Conn. 155, cited by defendant's counsel, is quite different from the case at bar. There the question arose as to whether the bank had a lien on the stock held by the insolvent stockholder for the amount of his indebtedness to the bank. The certificate of stock which he held expressly provided that the shares were subject to the indebtedness of the stockholder to the bank, and the court held that this provision was binding on him by his acceptance of the certificate, such an acceptance being tantamount to an agreement between him and the defendant that his stock should be subject to his indebtedness. The court, in referring to the terms of the certificate, said: "That provision is a qualification or restriction of the title of Smith to the stock, of which title it was the object of that certificate to furnish the legal evidence, or rather of which the certificate was the consummating act; and, as the monument of Smith's title, we think that it must be treated as an entire instrument of which the qualification is a part, and that the latter therefore cannot be disjoined from it, or treated as of no validity. To consider it otherwise than as an agreement would be to disregard the plain intention of the parties, which courts will always, if possible, carry into effect, and to sanction the perpetration of a fraud on the defendants. Smith having received the certificate proffered to him by the defendants with that restriction, neither he nor his assignee should be permitted to deny his assent to it, and that would be sufficient to constitute an agreement." It will be observed that this was a case where the corporation was in existence, and fully competent to transact business, when the stock was issued and the lien thereon created. The case of Morgan v. Bank of North America, 8 Serg. & R. 86, 11 Am. Dec. 575, which is specially relied on by defendant, is very similar to the one just cited. There the court found that by a long usage and course of dealing, well known to and acquiesced in by the assignor of the stock in question, the bank had a lien on the stock for the indebtedness to it of its stockholders; and that the plaintiff, who was the assignee of Wain, and therefore stood precisely in his situation, was bound by the custom, usage, and well-known understanding, which was tantamount to a contract with the bank regarding said transfer. In this case, as in the other, it will be seen that there were two parties fully competent to enter into the contract in question. McCreedy v. Rumsey, 6 Duer, 576, is also similar to the cases just referred to, except that there, under the articles of association, no stockholder could transfer his shares while he was indebted to the bank. And the court held that the assignee of the stockholder, as his successor, and under the statute, took the stock subject to the same liabilities. Re Dunkerson, 4 Biss. 227, is a case where the articles of association expressly authorize the restriction on the sale of the stock which is contained in the by-law, and hence was properly held to amount to a binding contract between the subscribers and the bank. Union Bank v. Laird, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 890, 4 L. ed. 269, is a case where the act of incorporation provided that no stockholder should transfer his stock until his indebtedness to the bank was satisfied, unless the president and directors should direct to the contrary. In Stebbins v. Phania F. Ins. Co. 8 Paige, 350, also the act of incorporation prohibits a transfer of stock until the stockholder's liabilities to the corporation are satisfied.

We have examined the numerous other cases cited by defendant's counsel in his elaborate brief bearing upon the questions under discussion, but we do not find that they sustain the position taken. But, even admitting that they do, the decided weight of authority, as well as the better reason, is to the contrary. Even conceding, therefore, that the defendant's contention as to the validity and effect of such an agreement or contract as is set up in its pleas, when made between parties who are competent to enter into it, is correct, yet, as no binding contract, and, indeed, no contract at all, is shown to have been made between Stearns and the defendant corporation regarding the restrictions on the transfer of the stock, as claimed, by reason of the fact that the defendant was not capable of making it; the entire defense, in so far as said pleas are concerned, necessarily fails. It is earnestly insisted by defendant's counsel, however, that the agreement in question, although made before the corporation was in existence, became operative upon the complete organization thereof by reason of the issuance of stock to the subscribers, including said Stearns. It is to be observed, incidentally, that the defendant does not allege in its pleas that any ratification of the contract said to have been made on August 10, 1892, ever took place. But, even assuming such an allegation therein, we do not think it would be of any avail, so long as there is no vote of the corporation in any way relating thereto; and we do not think that the mere act of the corporation in issuing the certificates of stock to Stearns, after the corporation was in fact in existence, amounted to a ratification by it of a contract made simply between the subscribers to the stock prior to the time when the corporation became a legal entity. In order to avail itself of the agreement alleged to have been made by the incorporators with the corporation before the existence of the corporation, the defendant must, as argued by plaintiff's counsel, show some new and positive act done after its complete organization ratifying said alleged agreement. The case at bar, in which the defendant seeks to avail itself of an agreement made before its incorporation, differs very materially from the case of a corporation which has accepted the benefit arising from a contract made by its promoters, and is held to be bound by such contract. The English authorities hold that a corporation cannot adopt or ratify a contract made before its incorporation. Kelner v. Baxter, L. R. 2 C. P. 174; Re Northumberland Avenue Hotel Co. L. R. 38 Ch. Div. 16. This rule has been followed in Massachusetts. In Abbott v. Hapgood, 150 Mass. 252, 5 L. R. A. 586, Knowlton, J., says: "If a contract is made in the name and for the benefit of a projected corporation, the corporation, after its organization, cannot become a party to the contract, even by adoption or ratification of it. . . . Such a contract must derive its vitality from the meeting of minds when both parties are in existence; until then, it can be nothing more than an offer by one party." Penn Match Co. v. Hapgood, 141 Mass. 148. Having thus come to the conclusion that the agreement set up in the defendant's pleas is invalid, and that the plaintiff is not bound thereby, any further consideration of the case at this time becomes unnecessary. We desire to add, however, that it has been brought to our notice in the amended pleadings, and also in the defendant's new brief, that there are certain other statutes in Maine in addition to chapter 46, § 6, relied on in our former opinion, relating to the power of corporations to pass by-laws. And the defendant now claims that under said statutes and the decisions of the supreme court of Maine, the by-law aforesaid is valid. As the case is only before us on the amended pleadings, however, and as this question is not discussed in the plaintiff's brief, we cannot now decide it. In view, however, of the importance of the question, and of the newly discovered statutes aforesaid, a motion for reargument of the original question would be entertained by the court.

*1. The statute requiring the locomotive bell to be rung or the whistle sounded 80 rods from the place where a railway crosses a traveled road or street does not apply to private farm crossings.

*2. But it does not follow that a railway company never, under any circumstances, owes to the adjacent landowner the duty of giving a warning signal that a train is approaching his crossing. The question is to be determined on general legal principles, whether, under all the circumstances, reasonable care required the giving of such a signal.

*3. While, as a general rule, and under ordinary circumstances, a railway company owes no such duty, yet the crossing may be so peculiarly dangerous, and the speed of the train so great, that reasonable care would require the giving of such a signal.

*4. Held, that under the facts of this case, in view of the peculiarly dangerous nature of the crossing and the unusually high speed of the train, it was a question for the jury whether it was negligence on the part of the defendant not to give a signal of the approach of the train.

Struck v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 58 Minn. 298.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by reason of a collision with one of defendant's passenger trains at a private crossing on plaintiff's farm. The negligence alleged and relied on at the trial as the ground of plaintiff's right of action was that the train approached the crossing, at a high and dangerous rate of speed, without any signal or warning being given of its approach. The only question in the case worthy of special consideration is whether the evidence justified a verdict for the plaintiff. The case made by the plaintiff was by no means a strong one, but, after carefully examining and re-examining the evidence, we have arrived at the conclusion that it made a case for the jury; in other words, that we cannot hold, as a matter of law, either that the defendant was not guilty of negligence, or that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The crossing was immediately east of a "cut" on defendant's road over 800 feet long, and varying in depth from nearly 6 feet at the east end to nearly 11 feet at the center, or deepest point. The defendant had permitted trees and brush to grow and remain on the sides or slopes of this cut, which materially added to the obstructions to the view westward. The crossing was therefore an exceedingly dangerous one to a person approaching it from the north, because of his inability to see trains coming from the west until he reached a point very near the railroad track. Plaintiff was about to drive his team, hitched to a farm wagon, from his house, on the north side of the railroad, over this crossing, to that part of his farm on the south side. He testified that, when he reached the gate in the railway fence (a distance of about 60 odd feet from the track), he stopped his team, went down upon the railroad track, and looked both east and west, but neither saw nor heard any train. The evidence shows that, if he did this, he would have a view of the track westward for a distance of from 1,600 to 1,800 feet. He further testified that he then drove through the gate upon the right of way, and, before crossing the track, stopped his team and listened for a train, and, hearing none, then drove on, still looking and listening, but that he neither saw nor heard the train until it was within about 100 feet of him, when his horses were already on the track. His testimony was corroborated by that of his daughter, who was riding in the wagon with him. There are some circumstances which tend to create doubt as to the entire accuracy of this testimony, but its credibility and weight were questions for the jury. Notwithstanding that this was a private crossing, where the defendant was neither accustomed, nor required by statute, to give signals of the approach of trains, and although it appears that plaintiff was entirely familiar with the situation, and knew that this train was due from the west at or about this time, we could not hold, as a matter of law, that he was guilty of contributory negligence, if his testimony and that of his daughter were true, which was a question for the jury.

2. The remaining question is whether the evidence justified the jury in finding that the defendant was negligent. We agree with counsel for the defendant that the statute requiring a bell to be rung or a whistle to be sounded at least 80 rods from the place where a railway crosses a "traveled road or street" on the same level does not apply to private farm crossings. It only applies to public roads; that is, roads traveled by the public. A mere farm crossing, designed exclusively for the convenience of the adjacent landowner, is never spoken of, either in the statutes or in common speech, as a "road." Probably the object in using the term "traveled road," instead of "highway" or "public highway," was to include roads actually used and traveled as public highways, without regard to whether they have been legally laid out or dedicated as such. But it does not necessarily follow from this that a railway company may never, under any circumstances, owe a duty to the adjacent landowner to give a signal or warning of an approaching train. It merely leaves the question to be determined on common-law principles, whether, under the circumstances of the case, reasonable care would have required the giving of such a warning. It may be conceded that, as a general rule, and under ordinary circumstances, a railway company owes no duty to the adjacent landowner to give him a warning signal, or to slacken the speed of its trains, on approaching a private crossing. The necessities of public travel and of the railway company would not permit of this; and when such a crossing is put in for the convenience of an adjacent landowner, although he has, of course, a legal right to its reasonable use, he must take it subject to the risk or burden incident to this condition of things. But reasonable care means the degree of care commensurate and corresponding with the situation. While in certain respects the rights of the adjacent landowner to use the crossing must, from the necessities of the case, be subordinate to the rights of the railway company to use its road, yet the rights and duties of each are correlative and reciprocal; and, in exercising its or his right, each must bear in mind the right of the other to use it also, and use reasonable care to avoid injury to such other while in the exercise of such right. Therefore, while there is no statutory obligation on a railroad company to give a signal of the approach of a train to a private crossing, yet the condition of the crossing as a peculiarly hazardous one, for any reason, coupled with the high rate of speed at which a train is running, may render the case one where reasonable care would require that some warning signal should be given. Thomas v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 8 Fed. Rep. 739.

In this case this crossing was, for the reasons already stated, a peculiarly dangerous one. This was, or ought to have been, fully known to the defendant and its servants. They knew that plaintiff was liable to be using the crossing. There was evidence that would justify the conclusion that this train, although on schedule time, was running at an unusual rate of speed. We attach very little weight to the mere opinions or estimates of nonexpert bystanders or passengers to that effect, but the case furnishes evidence of a more satisfactory character. The testimony of the engineer is that the schedule time of the train, including stoppages, was about 27 miles an hour, and that its usual actual running time between stations was about 80 miles an hour. It was a regular passenger train, presumably supplied with all the usual modern appliances, such as air brakes. The engineer testified that he knew of the collision the moment it occurred, and immediately applied the brakes with full force. But there is evidence tending to prove that the engine ran over 900 feet past the crossing before the train was brought to a full stop. We refer to the testimony of the measurement of the distance from the crossing to the place where the broken glass was found which was taken out of the cab window after the train stopped. There is no evidence that the grade was a descending one, or that the track was wet or slippery. This, corroborated as it was by some other evidence, would, we think, have warranted the jury in finding that the train was running at an unusually high rate of speed. Considering the peculiarly dangerous nature of the crossing, and the high rate of speed at which the evidence tended to show that the train was running, we think it was a question for the jury whether the defendant was negligent in not giving some warning signal, and hence we cannot say that their verdict is not supported by the evidence.

In response to some questions of pleading raised by counsel, we may add that while the complaint was evidently drawn on the theory that the statute imposed a duty on defendant to give a signal on approaching the crossing, and also that its custom previously had been to give such a signal, yet its allegations are broad enough to entitle the plaintiff to recover on common-law grounds, and irrespective of the existence of the custom referred to.

Order affirmed.

Board of Aldermen of the City of PROV-IDENCE.

1. Notice and opportunity to be heard need not be given to a property owner before the passage of an ordinance under statutory authority requiring him to connect his drainage with the sewer and destroy any cesspool on the property.
3. The legislature may declare privy vaults in thickly settled communities to be nuisances, and require them to be abated, without giving their owners opportunity to show in each particular case whether their vault is or is not in fact a nuisance.

The general principles of the law relating to the power of municipal corporations to define, prevent, and abate nuisances are treated of in the note to Grossman v. Oakland (Or.) 38 L. R. A. 568.

The question of the power of municipalities over nuisances affecting buildings and other structures will be found in note to Evansville v. Miller (Ind.) ante, 161.

A note to the case of Cape May v. Cape May, D. B. & S. P. R. Co. (N. J.) — L. R. A. —, shows the power of such authorities over nuisances on highways and waters.

Cases of nuisances affecting public morals, decency, peace, or good order, and the power of municipalities over the same, will form the subject of another note, as will also the question of prescription in cases of nuisances, and the jurisdiction of a court of equity when the aid of such court is sought by municipal authorities for the purpose of abating nuisances.

The question of smoke as a public nuisance within the power of municipalities to regulate, abate, and prevent will be found treated of in note to St. Louis v. Heitzberg-Packing & Provision Co. — L. R. A. —.

- I. Nuisances relating to public safety.
 - a. In general.

In Little Rock v. Barton, 33 Ark. 436, 442, it is said what are called police powers relate mostly to the government of municipal corporations. Of this nature is the authority to suppress nuisances, pre-

3. It is sufficient to authorize the abatement of privy vaults as nuisances that the legislature has so treated them in a statute stated to be for the benefit of the public health, without a distinct declaration in the statute that they are so.

4. A statute authorizing the destruction of a privy vault which had been ordered by municipal authorities to be destroyed notwithstanding an appeal from the order is not unconstitutional.

5. It is common knowledge that the condition in which privy vaults shall be kept, when allowed to exist, their construction, their locality, and the time and manner of removing their contents, have, especially in cities, been subjected to sharp police regulation.

6. The expenditure by a city of vast sums of money in perfecting its water and sewer systems is a matter of common knowledge.

serve health, prevent fires, to regulate the use and storage of dangerous articles, to establish and control markets, and the like.

In cases where a particular thing is denounced by the municipality as a nuisance it is not required that the ordinance shall provide for an investigation as to the fact whether or not it is a nuisance. Waters Pierce Oil Co. v. New Iberia, 47 La. Ann. 868.

The adjudication of a board of health under Pa. act 1849, providing for the removal of the cause of all nuisances then or thereafter existing, even without the aid of the city ordinance of 1872, which gives express authority to the board to fence in vacant lots, is sufficient to give the board of health power to fence in a lot for the purpose of preventing a nuisance. Wistar v. Addicks, 9 Phila. 145.

Under Pa. act 1849, April 5, a board of health had authority to remove the cause of all nuisances that existed, or that might thereafter be created, and therefore, under that act as construed along with the prior act of 1840, the board of health had the power to abate nuisances and their causes. Wistar v. Addicks, 9 Phila. 145.

Under a charter giving power to the mayor and council to pass all laws and ordinances that they may consider necessary for the preservation of the health, peace, prosperity, comfort, and security of the inhabitants of the city not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the state, a city would have power to pass an ordinance prohibiting boys and other persons unconnected with railroad trains, except passengers and other persons in the act of taking passage, from getting off or on engines or cars at the depot or elsewhere in the city limits. Bearden v. Madison, 73 Ga. 184.

So, under an ordinance giving the town power to declare what shall be considered nuisances and to prevent and remove the same, and to regulate the police of the town and make such ordinances as the good of the inhabitants of the town may require, the town has authority so to order the use of private property within its limits as to prevent its proving dangerous to the safety of the persons and property of citizens. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Haggerty, 87 Ill. 118, 119.

In Charleston v. Elford, 1 McMull. L. 224, an ordinance prohibiting the throwing of bales of cotton or other articles from the second story or upper floors of warehouses within the city into the streets of the same was held a valid exercise of the police power as essential to the safety of the inhabitants.

In Agnew v. Washington, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. 180, an ordinance making it unlawful for any person to PETITION by appellants for a new trial after a ruling by the trial judge directing a verdict confirming the order upon an appeal from an order of the board of aldermen of the city of Providence directing petitioners to connect their premises with the sewer in the street and destroy all cesspools on the property. New trial denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Henry J. Spooner and Cooke & Angell for appellants.

Messrs. Francis Colwell and Albert A. Baker, for appellee:

Said acts are constitutional. They come within the broad powers of the legislature to abolish nuisances and provide for the public health.

A privy is prima facie a nuisance, and has been tolerated only as a matter of necessity.

Wood, Nuisance, § 512; Wahle v. Reinbach, mine, drill, or bore for natural gas or oil within the limits of the borough at any point within 150 feet of any house, stable, or other building, or for the owner of any lot of ground within the borough to permit such well to be drilled on his lot within 150 feet of any house, stable, or other building, and providing that in case of any refusal or neglect after ten days' notice to abate the same, that the chief burgess should have power to inflict a penalty and cause the nuisance to be abated and removed at the cost of the owner of the premises, was upheld upon the ground that the same constituted a public nuisance endangering the lives and property of the citizens and interfering with their peace and comfort, although there was no jurisdiction given to such burgess to collect the penalty by summary conviction under Pa. acts 1851 or 1887.

See more particularly, as to the general rules in cases of nuisances affecting public health arising from particular trades or business, note to Ex parte Lacey (Cal.) — L. R. A. —.

b. Electricity, steam, and explosives.

In abating nuisances by the public authorities it has been said there may be substances like some explosives which are dangerous in cities under all circumstances, and made dangerous by city conditions, but most dangerous things are not so different in cities as to require more than increased or qualified safeguards, and to suppress things not absolutely dangerous, as an easy way of getting rid of the trouble of regulating them, is not a process tolerated in free institutions, regulation, and not prohibition, being the extent of such power. Re Frazee, 65 Mich. 398, 404.

The creation of an extra hazardous business in the public streets, such as one using electricity, or of organizations to use elements therein, dangerous to life from their very nature, can only be legal, if at all, when they are so burdened as to secure the public safety preliminary to such use, and its continuance by the untiring and unfailing vigilance of the person or corporation: and, if this cannot be done, then a nuisance is created and exists, and not the lawful enterprise, and such nuisance may be abated by the public authorities. United States Illuminating Co. v. Grant, 55 Hun, 222.

And the legislature has no power to violate the laws of public safety, and, consequently, none to authorize an enterprise to be conducted in the public streets by the use of a death-dealing factor, unless the conditions imposed concerning and controlling it are such as to secure the public safety, not for a time, but for all time during its use, and whenever this safety ceases to exist the business

No laws have been more uniformly supported by the courts than the so-called health laws when reasonable in their intent and calculated in a measure at least to secure such reasonable result.

Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 636; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 374; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, 67 Ill. 87, 16 Am. Rep. 611; Watertown v. Mayo, 109 Mass. 815, 12 Am. Rep. 694; Cooley, Const. Lim. 4th ed. 784.

Every presumption is in favor of the constitutionality of said statutes.

People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 389; Erie & N. E. R. Co. v. Casey, 26 Pa. 287; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Riblet, 66 Pa. 164, 5 Am. Rep. 360; Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 700, 718, 25 L. ed. 496, 501.

Said acts are not unconstitutional in that they confer summary power and that no pro-immediately becomes a nuisance, and may be abated as such. United States Illuminating Co. v. Grant, 55 Hun, 222.

Electric wires stretching over and upon the roofs of buildings in a thickly populated city, in such a manner that, if a fire should occur, they would greatly add to the risk, are a constant and continuous menace and nuisance which may be abated by a city. Electric Improv. Co. v. San Francisco, 45 Fed. Rep. 568, 565, 13 L. R. A. 181.

So, a wire carrying a heavy current of electricity and not properly insulated is dangerous to life and a public nuisance, which the board has the right to direct the immediate discontinuance of without notice; and the board of health, under the peculiar phraseology of the New York act conferring powers upon it, has a right to remove such wires because dangerous to human life, and the department of public works has also a right to remove all obstructions which interfere with the use of the streets, and has therefore ample authority to abate such nuisance. United States Illuminating Co. v. Grant, 55 Hun, 222.

If the entire system by which electricity is used for the lighting of public streets becomes, as a conclusive and openly apparent fact, so flagrantly and imminently dangerous to human life as to come within the principles governing conflagrations and pestilence, the corporate authorities can doubtless summarily abate it, but if, on the other hand, the systems are not necessarily and unavoidably dangerous to human life, if they can be kept in a safe condition by active vigilance and proper repairs, they are permitted to continue until the subways are made for their reception, and in that case while the entire system may not be a nuisance, that part of it which is suffered to become dangerous is a nuisance of the highest kind. United States Illuminating Co. v. Grant, 55 Hun, 222.

In Lexington & O. R. Co. v. Applegate, 8 Dana, 289, 33 Am. Dec. 497, it is said that the law is made for the times, and will be made or modified by them. The expanded and still expanding genius of the common law should adapt it here as elsewhere to the improved and improving condition of our country and countrymen, and therefore railroads and locomotives, the offspring, as they will be the parents, of progressive improvements, should not in themselves be considered as nuisances, although in ages that are gone they might have been so held because they would have been comparatively useless and therefore mischievous.

There are many things which courts have power to declare nuisances, and in such cases it is sufficient to show the existence of the fact constituting the nuisance in order to empower a city council to abate such nuisances. The use of steam for the purpose of propelling a street car along the public streets in a thickly populated town will constitute a nuisance per se, in the absence of any legislative grant authorizing such use, and therefore an ordinance of a municipal corporation which forbids such use and declares it a nuisance is valid and will be upheld. North Chicago City R. Co. v. Lake View, 105 Ill. 207, 44 Am. Rep. 788, 790.

The mere fact that a steam engine is liable to explode, and that it is used in a business in which combustible materials are necessarily brought in dangerous proximity to the fire of its boiler, such as the business of a carpenter and box maker, thereby subjecting buildings and merchandise in that vicinity to increased danger from fire, raising the premiums of insurance and exciting the fears of neighboring owners for the safety and security of their property, does not constitute the same a nuisance. Baltimore v. Radecke, 49 Md. 217, 227, 38 Am. Rep. 239, 242. Rhodes v. Dunbar, 37 Pa. 314, 98 Am. Dec. 221, to the same effect.

Steam railway cars running through a city street, unless conducted with more than human watchfulness, may be regarded as a public nuisance, and therefore a statute giving the common council power to regulate the running of such cars within the corporate limits authorizes the adoption of an ordinance entirely prohibiting the propelling of cars by steam through any part of the city. Buffalo & N. F. R. Co. v. Buffalo, 5 Hill, 209.

A steam engine used as a means of locomotion upon a public highway is not necessarily a nuisance, it may possibly be a nuisance at some times, and under some circumstances, but the question in any such case is one of fact; a question of reasonable conduct and management on the part of both parties, and therefore a question for the jury. Macomber v. Nichols, 84 Mich. 212, 22 Am. Rep. 522, 523.

So, a stationary steam engine is not itself a nuisance, even if erected and used in the midst of a populous city, unless it interferes with the safety or convenience of the public in the use of the streets, or unless it is used in connection with some trade or occupation which the law pronounces offensive or noxious. Baltimore v. Radecke, 49 Md. 217, 38 Am. Rep. 239, 242.

And a city ordinance which prohibits the erection of a steam engine within the city limits without the consent of the mayor and common council, giving them the power to revoke such permits and

The trial court ruled correctly in rejecting evidence to the effect that the vault in question was not a nuisance and not prejudicial to the public health, and evidence as to the propriety and necessity of making such an order.

Miller v. Horton, 152 Mass. 540, 10 L. R. A. 116.

Rogers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question in this case before the court at this time is as to the constitutionality of R. I. Pub. Laws, chap. 777, of April 25, 1889, as amended by chapter 1407 of March 1, 1895, and which act, as amended, is as follows:

"Sec. 1. The board of aldermen of the city of Providence may compel any abutting owner or occupant of land upon any street in said city in which there is a sewer to connect the drainage of his land and premises with such sewer, and may direct said owner or occupant to fill up and destroy any cesspool, privy vault, to force the removal thereof, after a specified notice, and imposing a certain penalty for neglect of such request, is unreasonable and void, the same not being a nuisance per se, even though used in a populous city, notwithstanding the fact that the city has power to pass ordinances for the prevention of fire and for other purposes beneficial to the city and the inhabitants thereof. Baltimore v. Radecke, 49 Md. 217, 38 Am. Rep. 239, 242.

Where permission was granted to erect and use a steam engine for the carrying on of a business pursuant to the terms of the city ordinance, whereby such engine was to be removed after six months' notice to that effect from the mayor, and after the expiration of such six months a suit was brought by justices for the recovery of the penalty for the nonremoval of such engine and to enforce its removal, the court granted an injunction to stay the proceedings of the city officers, the ordinance in question being void and inoperative as clothing one single individual with discretionary power, such engine itself and its use in the particular business not being a nuisance per se. Baltimore v. Radecke, 49 Md. 217, 227, 38 Am. Rep. 238.

In Vason v. South Carolina R. Co. 48 Ga. 681, 688, the court refused to abate as a nuisance the use of steam on a railroad run through the streets of a city under the power given by the state statutes and the ordinances and contracts of the city, although the use of steam locomotives in a street or public highway comes within the definition of a public nuisance, and although under the Revised Statutes of the state it "tends to annoy the community or injure the health of the citizens in general."

So, where by the terms of the charter, the common council of a city has power to prevent immoderate driving in the streets, and riding or driving on the sidewalks, and also to regulate the speed and running of locomotive engines and railroad cars through the city, and also power to declare what shall be considered nuisances in lots, streets, docks, wharves, and piers, and to direct, provide for, and enforce their removal, such council has no power by ordinance to prohibit as a nuisance the running of any locomotive, steam engine, train of cars of any kind whatsoever, through or upon any track, street, or thoroughfare in the city at a faster or greater rate of speed than a mile in six minutes. State, New Jersey R. & Transp. Co., v. Jersey City, 29 N. J. L. 170.

See, further, as to the use of electricity and steam upon the public streets and the power of a municipal or other arrangement for the reception of drainage.

"Sec. 2. Upon the service of any order or direction or a copy thereof upon any owner or occupant of such land to connect the drainage as aforesaid or to fill up or destroy any cesspool, privy vault, or other arrangement for the reception of drainage, such owner or occupant shall comply with such order or direction within ten days from the time of service of such order.

"Sec. 3. In case the owner or occupant to whom such order shall be directed shall neglect or refuse to comply therewith within ten days after the service thereof upon him, such owner or occupant shall be fined not less than $5 nor more than $20 for each subsequent twenty-four hours during which he shall neglect or refuse to comply therewith, and in case such neglect or refusal shall continue for sixty days after the service of said order, said board of aldermen may cause any cesspool, privy vault, or other arrangement for the reception of drainage upon the land of such owner or occupant to be filled up and destroyed, and the pendency of any appeal from any of such orders or doings of said board shall not affect the power of said board after the expiration of said period of sixty days to cause the same to be forthwith filled up and destroyed, the foregoing provisions being in the interest of the public health of said city.

"Sec. 4. This act shall take effect from and after its passage, and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed."

On August 1, 1895, the board of aldermen of the city of Providence passed the following resolution: "Resolved, that Ruth M. Harrington, wife of Wm. W., be, and she hereby is, ordered to connect the drainage of the land and premises situated on West Clifford street in this city, bounded and described as follows: . . . with the sewer in said West Clifford street, and that the said Ruth M. Harrington pally to abate the same and to prevent their becoming nuisances, note to Cape May v. Cape May, D. B. & S. P. R. Co. (N. J.)—L. R. A.—.

Other explosive substances have also been made the subject of municipal control.

Thus, it has been stated that the business of keeping, storing, and dealing in inflammable and explosive oils is a legitimate one, and every citizen has an inherent right to engage in the business in equal terms with other citizens. Richmond v. Dudley, 129 Ind. 112, 115, 13 L. R. A. 587.

An ordinance relating to the keeping and storing of explosives, which does not establish any general rules for the storage of the substances proposed to be regulated, but reserves to itself at regular meetings the right to grant or refuse permission to keep and store such oils and materials, dependent upon whether it, at such times, deems the location and buildings suitable for such purposes, and the person presenting the petition "a proper person," and providing that the permission when granted "may be revoked at any time at the option of the council," gives the common council an arbitrary control of the business without any fixed or known rules, and is therefore invalid. Richmond v. Dudley, 129 Ind. 112, 114, 13 L. R. A. 587. The ordinance, however, did not expressly declare such business a nuisance.

So, an ordinance prohibiting the keeping of inflammable or explosive substances within the city limits in greater quantities than therein specified, and providing for the presentation of a petition to the council specifying the location of the premises, the kind of vessels used, and the purposes for which kept, and leaving the granting of the permit to the common council's discretion, is invalid as not specifying the rules and conditions to be observed in such business, and as not admitting of the exercise of the privileges by all citizens alike upon complying with such rules, and as admitting of the exercise, or of an opportunity for the exercise, of an arbitrary discrimination by the municipal authorities between citizens who will comply. Richmond v. Dudley, 129 Ind. 112, 116, 13 L. R. A. 587.

And an ordinance passed pursuant to the city charter, giving the common council power to make by-laws and ordinances not inconsistent with the laws of the state and necessary to carry out the objects of the corporation, which ordinance prohibits the keeping of a quantity of straw exceeding 5 tons unless inclosed in a fire-proof inclosure, is in derogation of common right or unreasonable as contrary to the general welfare of the community. Clark v. South Bend, 85 Ind. 276, 278, 44 Am. Rep. 13.

C. N. S. 196, 3 Jur. N. S. 570, in which the defendants were indicted for a public nuisance in keeping and storing large quantities of wood, naphtha, and rectified spirits in a warehouse bordering on the streets, it was held that it was not error to charge the jury that if the depositing and keeping the naphtha, coupled with its liability to ignition ab extra, were dangerous to life and property by reason of its being so inflammable that water could not put out the fire unless applied in enormous quantities, and that a fire occasioned by the quantity kept by the defendants could not be so quenched and would prove disastrous to the neighborhood, they might find a verdict of guilty.

But in Anderson v. Savannah, 60 Ga. 472, the court refused to restrain the action of the defendants in storing naphtha, the penalties imposed by the law of the state being ample for the protection of the public.

With reference to the keeping and storing of gunpowder there would seem to have been a conflict in opinion as to whether or not the keeping of that substance in large quantities is a nuisance per se, the earlier cases inclining to the opinion that it is, the later ones making the manner of keeping the subject of the nuisance.

It has been held that the keeping of gunpowder in great quantities is a nuisance. Rex v. Taylor, 2 Strange, 1167.

So, it has been said that to manufacture or keep gunpowder in large quantities in towns or closely inhabited places is, by the common law of England, a nuisance and an indictable offense. Reg. v. Lister, Dears. & B. C. C. 257, 26 L. J. M. C. N. S. 196, 3 Jur. N. S. 570; Rex v. Taylor, 2 Strange, 1167; Rex v. Williams, cited in 1 Russell on Crimes, 321; Crowder v. Tinkler, 19 Ves. Jr. 617.

Although with great and unremitting care gunpowder may be kept, and perhaps manufactured, in very large quantities without doing any damage, yet the law takes notice that occasional carelessness may be reckoned on, and forbids that to be done which on the occurrence of carelessness will, in all probability, prove destructive to life and property. Reg. v. Lister, Dears. & B. C. C. 257, 26 L. J. M. C. N. S. 196, 3 Jur. N. S. 570.

In Crowder v. Tinkler, 19 Ves. Jr. 617, 623, it is said to be a nuisance at common law to use articles of recent discovery, such as gunpowder or gas, so as to cause danger to the public, and that the construction of the English Statute, 12 Geo. III., chap. 61, does not authorize a powder mill which, will be a nuisance at common law, though, as working at the commencement of the act, it is not liable to the penalties imposed by it.

be, and she hereby is, directed to fill up and destroy any and all cesspools, privy vaults, or other arrangements for the reception of drainage on said premises, the said Ruth M. Harrington being the owner, occupant of said premises, within ten days from the time of service of this order, or of a copy thereof, upon said Ruth M. Harrington." August 3, 1895, a copy of said resolution or order was duly served upon Mrs. Harrington, and, an appeal from said proceedings of the board of aldermen having been taken by Mr. and Mrs. Harrington,—for both husband and wife joined in the appeal,—and a claim for jury trial having been made, trial was had before the common pleas division, in which, upon the admissions of the appellants, a verdict was directed by the court ratifying and confirming the said order of the board of aldermen. At the jury trial it was admitted and agreed that Mrs. Harrington was the owner of the premises described; that there was a privy vault used for the reception of human excrements upon said premises; that West Clifford street was a sewer street; that said board of aldermen passed said order August 1, 1895; that said order was duly served on Mrs. Harrington August 3, 1895, and that before the making of said order Mrs. Harrington had no notice to appear before the board of aldermen, and show cause why said order should not be made against her in the premises, nor any opportunity for a hearing. The appellants claimed that said chapter 777, as amended by chapter 1407 of the Public Laws, was unconstitutional. They also claimed that, although there was a privy vault on said premises, used for the reception of human excrements, yet it was not used for the reception of drainage in the sense in which they claimed the word was intended in the statute; and they offered to prove that on August 1, 1895, and long prior thereto, said privy vault was not kept and maintained as a nuisance, but was kept in good order and condition, and so as not to be prejudicial to the public health; and also that the drainage of said premises Again, it has been stated that, though gunpowder be a necessary thing for the defense of the kingdom, yet, if it be kept in such a place as to be dangerous to the inhabitants or passengers, it will be a nuisance. Anonymous, 12 Mod. 842.

And the keeping of gunpowder, nitro-glycerine, and other explosive substances in large quantities in the vicinity of a dwelling house or place of business has been said to be a nuisance per se abatable by action at law or injunction in equity. McAndrews v. Collier, 42 N. J. L. 189, 192, 36 Am. Rep. 508.

In Cheatham v. Shearon, 1 Swan, 213, 215, 55 Am. Dec. 734, the question was raised whether the erection of a powder magazine in a populous part of a city, and the keeping stored therein large quantities of gunpowder, was per se a nuisance. The court held it to be so without a doubt, stating that there were few things one could do that would annoy the community more than the deposit of a large quantity of gunpowder in the midst of a populous city.

By § 267 of the Criminal Code of Illinois, powder magazines located within 50 rods of any occupied dwelling, or established near incorporated towns at a point different from that appointed by law, are declared public nuisances. Chicago, W. & V. Coal Co. v. Glass, 34 Ill. App. 364, 366.

The keeping of a mill for the making of powder and other explosives upon the bank of a river upon which boats bearing thousands of persons and property passed and repassed, and near which were two railroads, the same being also within 75 yards of a country road, also a highway in constant use, was said to be a public nuisance which no care, having reference to its situation, could exempt from the charge of being a nuisance. Wilson v. Phoenix Powder Mfg. Co. 40 W. Va. 413, 416.

In the above case it is said that the manufacture and keeping of quantities of gunpowder, nitro-glycerine, and other explosives in, or dangerously near to, public places such as towns or highways is a public nuisance, and it makes no difference whether carefully or negligently conducted and managed; negligence being no material element.

So, the right of city authorities to prohibit the keeping of more than a certain quantity of gunpowder in the city, elsewhere than in a magazine approved by the council, and declaring such magazines dangerous to life and property, and directing their removal at the expense of the owners, was upheld in Davenport v. Richmond City, 81 Va. 636, 59 Am. Rep. 694.

after an elaborate review of the authorities upon the question as to whether or not gunpowder is a nuisance per se, the court stated that steam power, gas, electricity, dynamite, and gunpowder were in daily use, and had become indispensable for the convenience of the public and for the public defense. Invention of man and advancement in science have enabled the manufacturer of, or dealer in, these articles to provide the public or the individual with almost, if not altogether, absolute protection against danger or hurt from explosion. And, even had the manufacturing and storage of gunpowder in its early history been a nuisance at common law, yet the common-law definition of a nuisance would not include gunpowder at this day.

So, upon the question whether or not gunpowder, kept in large quantities in public places, is dangerous and per se a nuisance without regard to the manner of its use or keeping, it is said in Kinney v. Koopmann (Ala.) 37 L. R. A. 497, that, considering the vast number of gunpowder magazines, and the daily transportation of gunpowder by every known power of conveyance, its daily use by millions of persons in war or for blasting, or for amusement with scarcely a well-authenticated instance of spontaneous combustion, it cannot be said that gunpowder per se is dangerous.

Again, in Dumesnil v. Dupont, 13 B. Mon. 800, 805, 68 Am. Dec. 750, it is said that a powder magazine is not per se a nuisance.

And in Heeg v. Licht, 80 N. Y. 579, 36 Am. Rep. 654, it is said that the mere fact of the keeping of gunpowder does not of itself constitute a nuisance, and that in order to make it such the question as to the location of the building and the amount of the materials stored, together with other surrounding circumstances, must be taken into consideration.

From the case of Walker v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 71 Iowa, 658, 662, it would seem that giant powder is an explosive substance of immense disruptive powers, yet, if properly packed, the shipment of it by a railroad is not likely to be attended with any more hazard than the transportation of ordinary merchandise, and therefore it would not seem to constitute a nuisance per se.

Yet it has been held that the fact that an explosion of a powder magazine destroys buildings is sufficient to show that the keeping of gunpowder, considered with reference to the locality and quantity and the surrounding circumstances, constitutes a nuisance per se. Lafin & R. Powder Co. v. Tearney, 131 Ill. 323, 7 L. R. A. 262.

was on and before August 1, 1895, and ever since, connected with the sewer on West Clifford street; the broad claim of the appellants being the right to put in evidence to the jury as to the condition of that privy vault and of the premises and surroundings, in order that the jury might determine (as it was contended that it should determine) that an order of the kind aforesaid should not be passed against the said Ruth M. Harrington. The presiding justice ruled said statute constitutional as required by law, ruled out the evidence offered by the appellants, and directed the jury, upon the admissions made, to find a verdict ratifying and confirming the said order; whereupon the constitutional question was duly certified to the appellate division for determination, and the appellants petitioned for a new trial for the alleged misrulings upon the evidence and upon ordering the verdict; but the question now before this division, as stated above, is solely upon the constitutionality of said statute, the whole travel of the case in the common pleas division having been given merely to elucidate the constitutional aspect of it.

The appellants claim that chapter 777, Pub. Laws, and chapter 1407, in amendment thereof, are unconstitutional, because no provision is made for notice to the owner or occupant of premises, and no opportunity for hearing thereon is given to the owner or occupant, before the passage of the order or direction by the board of aldermen, and because, also, by the provisions of § 3, chap. 1407, the pendency of an appeal will not affect the power of the board to fill up and destroy the privy vault of such owner or occupant of the premises. This statute, "being in the interest of the public health of said city,"—to quote the concluding words of § 3 of it,—is clearly intended to be an exercise of what is called the "police power," and if it is a proper exercise of such power, both as to subject-matter and as to methods, then its constitutionality cannot be successfully impugned.

"Rights of property," says Chief Justice

Where the gunpowder was deposited in a building insufficiently secured and protected, and unfit for the safe-keeping of a large quantity of such an article, the situation of the building in other respects being such as to render the gunpowder dangerous to the lives of the citizens, the evidence showing that if an explosion ever, by accident or design, occurred at any period it would be disastrous to more or less of the inhabitants residing in the neighborhood, the court held that the same constituted a nuisance. Rudder v. Koopmann (Ala.) 37 L. R. A. 420.

In Myers v. Malcolm, 6 Hill, 292, 41 Am. Dec. 744, the negligent keeping of gunpowder was held to be a nuisance per se, the powder being kept in large quantities in an upper story of a carpenter's shop built of wood within the limits of the corporation, a lumber yard and a number of wooden buildings, some used as dwelling houses and others as stables, being in close proximity.

From the case of People v. Sands, 1 Johns. 78, 3 Am. Dec. 296, it would seem that the keeping of gunpowder, in order to be a nuisance per se, must be in a negligent and improvident manner, in order to sustain an indictment for a nuisance in keeping such powder.

So, in Bradley v. People, 56 Barb. 72, 73, the court supported the finding that the carelessness or negligent keeping of gunpowder in large quantities, near dwelling houses or where the lives of persons are thereby endangered, is a nuisance at common law, adopting the finding of the court in People v. Sands, 1 Johns. 78, 3 Am. Dec. 296, and Myers v. Malcolm, 6 Hill, 292, 41 Am. Dec. 744.

In Kinney v. Koopmann (Ala.) 37 L. R. A. 497, the court took exceptions to the ruling of the court in the above case of People v. Sands, 1 Johns. 78, 3 Am. Dec. 296, upon the ground that it did not consider that it was impossible to protect a powder house from lightning, and also to the ruling that a powder house in a populous city was a nuisance per se, the court being of opinion that a powder magazine might be constructed and so provided as to insure absolute security from lightning.

The storage of gunpowder in a city or town being attended with danger, its regulation is a matter within the power of the corporate authorities, and consequently the judgment of the city council as expressed in their ordinance requiring the removal of the magazines is conclusive upon the courts. Davenport v. Richmond City, 81 Va. 636, 642, 59 Am. Rep. 694.

The fact that a city sold to the defendants the site of the powder magazine ordered by the common council to be removed, for the purpose or with the knowledge that the same was to be used for the erection of such magazine, will not prevent the city council from passing an ordinance prohibiting its further use, if, in the judgment of such body, the safety or convenience of the people demands the removal of such magazines. Davenport v. Richmond City, 81 Va. 636, 642, 59 Am. Rep. 694.

The provisions contained in N. Y. Laws 1830, § 24, p. 362, that no person shall have powder in his store, comprehends every active possession, whether for the immediate purpose of removal or not, if such possession be in a store or other building or place, except, indeed, when the powder is on its passage in the street secured in a manner provided by the 29th section of the act and such statute is a mere police regulation to prevent nuisances in a city, and is not unconstitutional as conflicting with the clause of the Constitution of the United States granting to Congress the power to regulate commerce between the states. Foot v. New York Fire Department, 5 Hill, 99, 100.

So, an ordinance regulating the keeping of gunpowder in a city is necessary for the security and welfare of the inhabitants, and is a sanitary police regulation for the benefit and safety of the persons and property within the limits thereof, and is fully authorized by an act incorporating the city, giving the city council power to make and establish such by-laws, rules, and ordinances as shall appear necessary for the security of the public welfare and convenience of the city. Williams v. Augusta, 4 Ga. 509, 512.

In Harley v. Heyl, 2 Cal. 477, the question of the construction of the California statute of April 27, 1862, which authorized the erection of a powder magazine at a place to be sanctioned by the mayor, arose, the question being whether such statute interfered with the powers of the municipal authorities. The court stated that even under the old charter of the city, the city possessed the power of licensing and sanctioning such magazines, and that the same power existed under the city's new charter which was established since the passing of the statute, and therefore that the power remained in the city. The case, however, did not enter upon the question of such magazines being nuisances.

An ordinance authorizing the seizure of gunpowder, and declaring it forfeited, without legal investigation, when kept contrary to the provisions thereof, is void, although the city authorities may have the power to prevent the storage of such substances in large quantities within the city

Shaw in Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 58, 85, "like all other social and conventional rights, are subject to such reasonable limitations in their enjoyment as shall prevent them from being injurious, and to such reasonable restraints and regulations established by law, as the legislature, under the governing and controlling power vested in them by the Constitution may think necessary and expedient. This is very different from the right of eminent domain, the right of a government to take and appropriate private property to public use, whenever the public exigency requires it; which can be done only on condition of providing a reasonable compensation therefor. The power we allude to is rather the police power, the power vested in the legislature by the Constitution, to make, ordain, and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable laws, statutes, and ordinances, either with penalties or without, not repugnant to the Constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of the commonwealth, and of the subjects of the same. . . . Nor does the prohibition of such noxious use of property, a prohibition imposed because such use would be injurious to the public, although it may diminish the profits of the owner, make it an appropriation to a public use, so as to entitle the owner to compensation. . . . If a landlord could let his building for a smallpox hospital, or a slaughterhouse, he might obtain an increased rent. But he is restrained; not because the public have occasion to make the like use, or to make any use of the property, or to take any benefit or profit to themselves from it; but because it would be a noxious use, contrary to the maxim, Sic utere tuo, ut alienum non ledas. It is not an appropriation of the property to a public use, but the restraint of an injurious private use by the owner, and is therefore not within the principle of property taken under the right of eminent domain." In the words of Mr. Justice Harlan in the Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall.

for purposes of public safety. Cotter v. Doty, 5 Ohio, 368.

So, a city ordinance prohibiting the keeping of more than a specified quantity of gunpowder in any one place, declaring the same forfeited to the public authorities, and authorizing inspection of the premises and use of the powder there found without any legal adjudication, is void, although the city has a right to prohibit such keeping and to enforce the ordinance by fine. Cotter v. Doty, 5 Ohio, 363, 368.

In Hazard Powder Co. v. Volger, 58 Fed. Rep. 152, 156, 12 U. S. App. 665, the maintenance by defendant of a powder magazine containing a large quantity of powder within the city limits in violation of a city ordinance was held to be a nuisance. In this case, however, the action was brought to recover damages occasioned by the plaintiff from an explosion of the powder upon the defendant's premises, and was not one brought by the public authorities for a violation of the ordinance.

The case of Fillo v. Jones, 2 Abff. App. Dec. 121, 122, was a statutory action to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's testator by reason of an explosion of fire works on defendant's premises, and the court said that before such action could be maintained it must be shown that such keeping was a nuisance at common law, as a common nuisance dangerous to human life.

The power, when deemed necessary for public safety, to prohibit the blasting of rocks with gunpowder without written consent, is within the powers given by Mass. Pub. Stat. chap. 27, § 15, and therefore a city ordinance prohibiting such action without the written consent of the board of aldermen is valid, for the reason that blasting might be a private or a public nuisance. Com. v. Parks, 156 Mass. 531, 532.

The storing of gunpowder in large quantities, especially in thickly populated localities, is a nuisance which may be abated by the public authorities,—especially where the act of the legislature has recognized such storing as a nuisance. Wier's Appeal, 74 Pa. 220.

An ordinance declaring it to be a nuisance for any person or persons to keep or store in any building, or shed, or any other inclosure whatever within the limits of the corporation, any explosives or other highly inflammable materials dangerous to the safety of life in any other quantities than that which may be necessary for the supplying of the ordinary or every-day usage, or the demands of the retail selling business, is constitutional, and is not in restraint of trade, neither does it authorize the taking of private property without due process of law, and is therefore a valid exercise of the power given to such corporations to enact all necessary police regulations so far as the same do not conflict with the state and Federal Constitutions, the city charter also giving them power to pass ordinances relative to anything whatever that may concern the police and good government of the town. Waters Pierce Oil Co. v. New Iberia, 47 La. Ann. 868.

So, an ordinance prohibiting the storage and keeping for sale of explosive oils within the city limits, except in cellars, was held to be violated by a railroad company who warehoused such explosives for transportation, although they were not shown to have been stored for an unreasonable length of time. Wright v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 27 Ill. App. 200, 208. In this case the ordinance did not, however, specifically declare it a nuisance.

As to the use of electricity and steam in the streets, see note to Cape May v. Cape May, D. R. & S. R. Co. (N. J.)—1 L. R. A. —.

The subject of police regulation of electric companies forms the subject of a note to State, Laclede Gaslight Co., v. Murphy (Mo.) 31 L. R. A. 798.

As to the grant of franchises to electrical subways companies, see note to State, St. Louis Underground Service Co., v. Murphy (Mo.) 34 L. R. A. 369.

Upon the question of negligence in the manufacture and storage of gunpowder, nitro-glycerine, dynamite, and other explosives, see note to Judson v. Giant Powder Co. (Cal.) 29 L. R. A. 718.

II. Nuisances relating to health.

a. In general.

The power conferred upon city councils to make regulations for securing the general health of the inhabitants, and to abate, prevent, and remove nuisances, is conferred upon them for the public good. Armstrong v. Brunswick, 79 Mo. 319, 321. In this case, however, the action was brought against the city authorities for not enforcing the terms of its ordinance in abating a nuisance, and to recover damages occasioned by plaintiff from such neglect.

Under the general police power the legislature may delegate to a municipality the authority to pass ordinances for the preservation of the health or the promotion of the comfort, good order, and general welfare of its citizens, provided always that they are not in conflict with the provisions of the Federal and state Constitutions framed for the protection of the citizens and the enjoyment of 36, 62, 21 L. ed. 394, 404: "This power is, and must be from its very nature, incapable of any very exact definition or limitation. Upon it depends the security of social order, the life and health of the citizen, the comfort of an existence in a thickly populated community, the enjoyment of private and social life, and the beneficial use of property." Chief Justice Redfield, in Thorpe v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 27 Vt. 140, 149, 150, 62 Am. Dec. 625, uses this language: "This police power of the state extends to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons, and the protection of all property within the state; . . . [and] persons and property are subjected to all kinds of restraints and burdens, in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the state, of the perfect right in the legislature to do which no question ever was, or upon acknowledged general principles ever can be, made, so far as natural persons are concerned." To quote Mr. Justice Harlan again, and this time in Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 685, 32 L. ed. 253, 257: "The power which the legislature has to promote the general welfare is very great, and the discretion which that department of the government has, in the employment of means to that end, is very large." "Police regulations," says Mr. Justice Wilde in Baker v. Boston, 12 Pick. 183, 193, 22 Am. Dec. 421, "to direct the use of private property so as to prevent its proving pernicious to the citizens at large, are not void although they may in some measure interfere with private rights without providing for compensation. . . . If by such regulations an individual receives some damage, it is considered as damnum abeque injuria. The law presumes he is compensated by sharing in the advantages arising from such beneficial regulations." In regard to a Massachusetts statute authorizing equal rights, privileges, and immunities. State v. Summerfield, 107 N. C. 895, 897; State v. Moore, 104 N. C. 714; State v. Pendergrass, 106 N. C. 664.

In Re Ryers, 72 N. Y. 1, 7, 28 Am. Rep. 88, it is stated that it is a recognized constitutional power of legislation to provide for removing or abating that which, though at first lawful, proper, and unobjectionable, has afterwards become a public nuisance endangering the public health, and the legislation of the state in creating boards of health in cities, villages, and towns, and vesting in them great if not extreme and arbitrary powers, shows that the promotion and preservation of the public health are a public purpose.

One of the burdens cast upon a city in accepting its charter is the obligation to keep the city free from nuisances, and therefore, where the charter gives the city full power and authority to enact and pass all laws and ordinances necessary to preserve the health of the city and to prevent and remove nuisances, the power thus conferred is not merely discretionary, but imperative, and the words "power and authority" may be construed as "duty and obligation." Baldmore v. Marriott, 9 Md. 180, 174, 66 Am. Dec. 326.

Under the act of general assembly incorporating the city of Baltimore the corporation have full power to enact laws and ordinances necessary for the preservation of the health of the city and to prevent and remove nuisances and the introduction of contagious diseases within the city and within 3 miles thereof. Harrison v. Baltimore, 1 Gill, 264, 266.

A city charter expressly vesting in the city power "to suppress all nuisances" must be so construed as to apply to cases of nuisances clearly so to the detriment of public health and public convenience. Tisot v. Great Southern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. 39 La. Ann. 998.

In State v. Summerfield, 107 N. C. 895, 899, an ordinance which prohibited produce, merchandise, cooked provisions, poultry, fruits, vegetables, or other commodities from being kept exposed for sale in or upon any sidewalk or the space in front of buildings used as sidewalks, alley, gutter, or street of the town, and the placing of any stand thereon for the purpose, and also the exposure of any such articles thereon or in the space in front of any building in such manner as to be in the way of persons traveling the same, was upheld as valid for the reason that such articles might, in the opinion of the commissioners based on reasonable grounds, endanger the health of the citizens of the town or incommode them in passing by a way left open for them by the owner, or might frighten horses attached to vehicles driven along the streets, which circumstances would be sufficient to warrant the enactment under the general authority to prohibit businesses, protect health, and prevent individuals from so using their own property as to subject others to serious and unnecessary inconvenience or danger.

Generally it is for the legislature to determine what laws and regulations are needed to protect the public health and to secure the public comfort and safety, and while its measures are calculated, intended, convenient, and appropriate to accomplish these ends, the exercise of its discretion is not subject to review by the courts. But they must have some relation to these ends. Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 109, 110, 50 Am. Rep. 636. In the above case the constitutionality of the New York act to improve the public health by prohibiting the manufacture of cigars was attacked, such act being declared unconstitutional as being beyond the legislative power of police regulation as not being a health law, having no relation whatever to the public health, the legislature having no power to declare an act or thing to be a common nuisance which, palpably, is not, and cannot be such under any circumstances, by the common-law definitions or decisions.

Under N. Y. Laws 1867, chap. 956, whatever is dangerous to human life or detrimental to health, and whatever renders the air or human food or drink unwholesome, is a nuisance. Jamica v. Long Island R. Co. 37 How. Pr. 379, 382.

The abatement of a nuisance detrimental to public health is one of the ordinary functions of the police power of the state. Kelley v. New York, 6 Misc. 516, 521. To the same effect Renwick v. Morris, 7 Hill, 575; Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 697, 24 L. ed. 1088.

The municipal authorities have power to abate a nuisance by pulling down and removing tenements or buildings which are old and almost worthless, filthy, and crowded with filthy tenants, and injurious to the health and comfort of the neighborhood, especially where they have been occupied by patients afflicted with smallpox and are in an improving and flourishing party of the city, and more especially where the owner is able to repair and improve them, but fails to do so, the same having been condemned as a nuisance by the board of health of the city, the charter of which gives it ample power to suppress and abate nuisances, even though there may be some proof that they have been cleaned and whitewashed. Ferguson v. Selma, 43 Ala. 398, 401.

So, for the purposes of destroying, removing, or preventing sickness, the city authorities may destroy, injure, or appropriate private property other the city council of Boston to raise the grade of certain lands in order to secure a complete drainage thereof, Mr. Justice Morton in Nickerson v. Boston, 181 Mass. 306, 308, said: "It belongs to that class of police regulations to which private rights are held subject, and is founded upon the right of the public to protect itself from nuisances, and to preserve the general health. The authority of the legislature to pass laws of this character is too well settled to be questioned." See also Com. v. Roberts, 155 Mass. 282, 16 L. R. A. 400. Unwholesome trades, slaughterhouses, operations offensive to the senses, the burial of the dead, drainage, the deposit of powder, and the building with combustible materials in thickly settled communities, are some of the numerous matters to which the police power has been applied, but the list is too long to make an attempt at enumeration practicable. See 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 748; 2 Kent, Com. 840; Cooley, Const. Lim. 712 et pass.

than that which constitutes or causes the nuisance. Salem v. Eastern R. Co. 98 Mass. 431, 433, 96 Am. Dec. 630.

The board of health has power to declare and abate nuisances. Kennedy v. Philadelphia Bd. of Health, 2 Pa. 306; Philadelphia v. Provident Life & T. Co. 132 Pa. 224.

And such a board in abating a public nuisance may, under Mass. Stat. 1883, chap. 160, act by a committee for the reason that the board of health can do the work by agents. Grace v. Newton Bd. of Health, 135 Mass. 490, 497.

The New Jersey statute, giving boards of health power to abate nuisances hazardous to public health, does not apply or give authority to such boards of health to abate nuisances which merely render home uncomfortable or depreciate the value of property, or only amount to an annoyance to individuals or communities, and in such cases the relief is to be sought by the individual or the community. State, Hamilton Twp. Bd. of Health, v. Neldt (N. J.) 19 Atl. 318.

Where, under the legislative authority granted to a city council to abate nuisances, the property owner is permitted to abate nuisances, such council must first ascertain, after judicial hearing by the owner, the existence of the nuisance, and then determine the manner in which the work is to be done in order that the owner may intelligently exercise his privilege of abating the same at his own expense. Joyce v. Woods, 78 Ky. 386, 389. In this case the nuisance complained of was stagnant water, filled with putrid substances which the city sought to have abated, and then to recover the costs thereof from the owner; but the court refused their demand, no opportunity to be heard having been given to the defendant.

Under a city charter conferring upon the city council within the city limits power to make regulations to secure the general health of the inhabitants, and to abate, prevent, and remove nuisances, the power is conferred upon the corporation for the public good and not for private corporate advantage, and such power is exercised by the city council in the passing of an ordinance devolving upon the constable, upon complaint of the existence of a nuisance made to him by any person, the duty of removing or abating it. Armstrong v. Brunswick, 79 Mo. 319, 321.

The resolution of a board of health declaring that a nuisance exists on lots between certain streets north and south of another street cannot be held to include a nuisance existing on land lying at the southwest corner of such latter street, for the reason that judgment should be certain or 86 L. R. A.

Is the subject-matter of said chapter 777, as amended by chapter 1407, R. I. Pub. Laws, a proper one for the constitutional use of the police power? And by this we mean not merely the regulation of the use of privy vaults, cesspools, and other arrangements for the reception of drainage, but the absolute abatement of them under certain conditions, regardless of the manner in which they may chance to be kept. It is sufficient for us in this inquiry to consider privy vaults alone, as it is agreed on all hands that it was a privy vault only that was, as a matter of fact, obnoxious to the statute in the case at bar, and that, too, one used solely for the reception of human excrements; for a statute may be unconstitutional in part and constitutional in part, and, while the unconstitutional part may be void, the constitutional part may be valid, and may be carried into effect, the test in such cases being whether the parts are so interwoven and interdependent that they can stand only as a whole.

capable of being reduced to a certainty. City v. Houseman, 2 Phila. 349.

In Hutton v. Camden, 30 N. J. L. 123, 23 Am. Rep. 203, the proceedings of the board of health in filling up the plaintiff's lot to the level of the street without notice to him and an opportunity to be heard were held void, and the court refused to impose upon them the expenses incurred by the board in so doing.

Where the board of health, upon complaint that the cattle-feeding barns used by the plaintiff, and the cattle kept therein, were a nuisance, inducing zymotic disease, heard the parties and duly construed the allegations and reached the conclusion that a nuisance existed, and the common council took further action to remove the cattle as a sanitary necessity, the city charter giving ample power to abate nuisances, the plaintiff's action to restrain the proceedings of the board, and his injunction restraining such action, were dissolved, the board having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, having heard the parties and determined the matter. Cook v. Buffalo, 16 N. Y. Week. Dig. 8.

Under the New York public health law, § 21, as amended by the Laws of 1895, chap. 203, which declared that every such local board of health may impose penalties for violation of its orders or regulations to be used for and recovered by it in the name and for the benefit of the municipality, and may maintain actions in any court of competent jurisdiction to enforce such orders and regulations, an action for the abatement of a nuisance and the enforcement of such orders and regulations by the board of health must be brought in the name of the municipality. Green Island Bd. of Health v. Magill, 17 App. Div. 249.

And an ordinance prohibiting the feeding of milch cows on still slopes, and the selling of milk from cows fed on such slopes, and from sick or diseased cows, was upheld by the court in Johnson v. Simonton, 43 Cal. 242, the same being for the preservation of the public health, although not specifically declared a nuisance.

Where a defendant is charged with creating a nuisance in violation of § 221, cl. 1, Ill. Crim. Code (Starr & Curtis), § 227, p. 815, it is immaterial whether the defendant intended the prejudicial result to others or not, if the result flows from his unlawful act in collecting and depositing the prohibited noisome substances, as it is presumed that every sane man intends the natural and probable consequences of his act. Seacord v. People, 121 Ill. 623, 629, 632.

State v. Clark, 15 R. I. 888; Re Constitutional Amendment, 16 R. I. 754, 758; State v. Tonks, 15 R. I. 885.

The receptacles known as privy vaults, for what might not inaptly be called the drainage of the human body, viz., human excrements, have in thickly settled communities been a very common matter for the exercise of the police power. It is common knowledge that the condition in which they shall be kept when allowed to exist, their construction, their locality, the time and manner of removing their contents, have, especially in cities, been subjected to sharp police regulation. Few things are more disagreeable to the senses or more injurious to health than the noisome smells too frequently arising from them. Their very presence is a menace to comfort and health, and a source of apprehension to the neighborhood. The best that can be done so long as they exist is to reduce the dangers within them a sanitary act, and applies only to such nuisances as are injurious to health, and therefore, where the nuisance complained of was rainwater which collected on a railroad bridge, and, running through the planks, dripped onto the highway and upon persons using the same, it was held that the same could not be abated under the act. Great Western R. Co. v. Bishop, L. R. 7 Q. B. 550, 28 L. T. N. S. 905, 20 Week. Rep. 969, 41 L. J. M. C. N. S. 120.

b. Removal of filth, etc.

Under a power to preserve the health of the city, and to prevent and remove nuisances, a municipal corporation has the undoubted right to pass ordinances creating boards of health, appointing health commissioners with other subordinate officials, regulating the removal of house dirt, night soil, refuse, offals, and filth by persons licensed to perform such work, and providing for the prohibition, abatement, and suppression of whatever is intrinsically and inevitably a nuisance. Vogt v. Baltimore (Md.), 4 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 329, 331; Boehm v. Baltimore, 61 Md. 259, 263.

And such ordinances, being for the preservation of the health of the city and to prevent and remove nuisances, and also to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases, are ordinary proper exercises of the power to preserve the health of the city and to abate nuisances. Vogt v. Baltimore (Md.), 4 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 329, 331.

So, the fact that garbage is not a nuisance or detrimental to health does not exempt it from police power or entitle a citizen to transport it without a license. State v. Orr, 68 Conn. 101, 34 L. R. A. 279.

In the above case of State v. Orr, 68 Conn. 101, 34 L. R. A. 279, an ordinance prohibiting the collection or transportation of garbage without a license was held to be within the provisions of the charter giving the authorities power to regulate by ordinance the collection and removal of garbage, although no express provisions for licenses was made.

So, in that case it was said that "refuse matter" within the meaning of an ordinance prohibiting the transportation without a license of "such refuse matter as accumulates in the preparation of food for the table" includes only what is abandoned as worthless; but such materials as may be properly utilized for other purposes when they do not constitute a nuisance remain property which may be sold or otherwise disposed of at the will of the owner. State v. Orr, 68 Conn. 101, 34 L. R. A. 279.

A city by-law prohibiting unlicensed persons from removing house dirt and offal from a city will be upheld upon the ground that, if everyone were engaged in such a business, there would be a continual moving nuisance in the streets of the city, breaking up the streets by their weight, and poisoning the air with their effluvia, and such a by-law is binding upon strangers coming within the city limits. Vandine, Petitioner, 6 Pick. 187, 17 Am. Dec. 351.

Reasonable regulations and restrictions in respect to the removal of night soil are within the powers delegated to the boards of health by N. Y. Laws 1875, chap. 633, as amended by Laws 1880, chap. 545, and the exercise of such power is not an unconstitutional interference with individual rights or with the freedom of trade. Brooklyn Bd. of Health, 13 N. Y. Week. Dig. 185, 186.

As a means of preventing a nuisance, it would seem that an ordinance of the board of health prohibiting the removal of night soil without a permit is within the powers conferred upon a board of health, such board having power to restrain the use of private property and the acts and businesses of all persons within the state for any purpose that is incompatible with the public health. Brooklyn Bd. of Health, 13 N. Y. Week. Dig. 185, 186.

The use of a cremator within a village for the destruction of garbage, etc., in such a manner as to substantially damage the surrounding premises by the stenches arising therefrom, is not authorized by N. Y. Laws 1893, chap. 376, which provide for the maintenance of a cremator for such purposes within village limits, and its use in such a manner as to cause or permit stenches to come from it will be enjoined. Kobbe v. New Brighton, 20 Misc. 477.

tional powers of the legislature as a police regulation. It is an act for the preservation of the public health, and relates to the disposal of one of the most dangerous forms of sewage." But it is contended on the part of the appellants that the privy vault itself, when properly used, is neither a nuisance nor injurious to health or comfort; that it only becomes so when not properly cared for, and therefore that its abuse, or improper use, alone makes it subject to police regulation and repression. The storage of gunpowder, the existence of buildings of such character and condition as to make them liable to catch fire, in thickly settled neighborhoods, have frequently been the subject of police regulation and repression, but neither would do any actual harm until carelessness, accident, or some unforeseen agency set them on fire, an event that might never happen; and yet the menace and the apprehension caused by their presence have been frequently deemed sufficient to justify their removal under the police power.

The reasonable exercise of human power must always be exerted within reasonable human limitations. It is one of the laws of human nature that there shall be, from time to time, rejections from our persons of unsimulated matter, and this higher law must be recognized in judging of the reasonableness of any human legislation in any wise pertaining to it; hence the necessity of some sort of provision for these rejections is always recognized by legislatures and courts. The crudest and most objectionable provision for this in civilized countries is presented by a great army in the field in time of war; while the most perfect and least objectionable provision for it is afforded in those towns and cities possessing the best water and sewage systems, thus making possible what are called the "modern conveniences." It is common knowledge that the

In Train v. Boston Disinfecting Co. 144 Mass. 523, 50 Am. Rep. 113, rags were seized and destroyed by the order of the public authorities under the powers conferred upon the board of health to examine into all cases of sickness, nuisance, and sources of filth in any vessel within Boston harbor, or within the limits thereof, and to destroy, remove, or prevent the same.

As to municipal power in case of epidemics, see note to Thomas v. Mason (W. Va.) 26 L. R. A. 727.

Dirt, rubbish, garbage, and filth are in their nature nuisances; and that glass or broken ware can be very easily converted into nuisances if thrown about promiscuously is equally plain. Ex parte Casinello, 62 Cal. 538, 539.

So, garbage is in the nature of a nuisance which it is within the power of the local authorities to provide against. Newtown v. Lyons, 11 App. Div. 105.

And a city ordinance requiring garbage to be removed through, and out of, the city in water-tight close carts or wagons, marked "garbage," is a reasonable exercise of the police power as a means of preventing nuisances. People v. Gordon, 81 Mich. 306.

Again, an ordinance prohibiting the throwing into or depositing upon any public street, highway, or grounds, or upon any private premises, or anywhere except in such places as are designated for that purpose by the superintendent of public streets and highways, of any glass, broken ware, dirt, rubbish, garbage, or filth, is valid, and within the power vested in the board of supervisors by the California act of April 25, 1863, which authorizes and directs the summary abatement of nuisances and the making of regulations for the preservation of the public health and the prevention of contagious diseases, the same not being in conflict with § 11 of art. 11 of the state Constitution. Ex parte Casinello, 62 Cal. 538, 539.

And the proceedings of one appointed by a board of health to carry out the resolutions of such board, passed after duly called meetings and notices to remove the nuisances, in removing and destroying brush and oysters which in the opinion of such board, after procuring medical testimony, they declare to be a nuisance injurious to the public health, are valid, even though such material was not necessarily filthy. *Raymond v. An ordinance prohibiting the deposit of certain specified matters in a public street, or upon any lot, or upon the banks of any canal or river in the city, and imposing a penalty for the violation thereof, is not valid under a power conveyed by the city charter to abate and remove nuisances; yet it is valid under the power conveyed by another section of the New York act, giving the city authority to do all acts, make all regulations, and pass all ordinances which they deem necessary for the preservation of health and the suppression of disease in the city, and to carry into effect and execute the powers thereby granted. Rochester v. Collins, 12 Barb. 559, 562.

The proceedings of the board of health declaring the depositing of manure on any lots in a city to be a nuisance, and abating the same without notice or opportunity to be heard, were adjudged illegal in People, Savage, v. New York Bd. of Health, 38 Barb. 344, such a board having no power to declare any trade or occupation carried on within the limits of the city to be a nuisance without notice and an opportunity of being heard.

A nuisance, injurious and dangerous to health, consisting of an accumulation of foul mud, existing between the high and low water mark in a tidal creek running inland from the line of a river, cannot be abated by the public authorities by an order made upon the conservators of such river as owners of the property, as, under § 4, subsec. 1, of the English public health act 1891, the sanitary authority, if satisfied of the existence of a nuisance liable to be summarily abated under the act, must serve notice on the person by whose act, default, or sufferance the same arises or continues, or if not found, upon the occupier or owner of the premises, such subsection being read with subsection 3 which provides that if such parties cannot be found, and the nuisance does not arise from the act of the occupier or owner, the same shall be abated by the authorities, and be construed as saying that when the person causing a nuisance cannot be found, the liability of the owner of the premises to abate only arises where it is shown that it continues by his act, default, or sufferance, the order made upon the conservators being wrong, they not being owners of the soil for the purposes of such city of Providence has expended vast sums of money in perfecting its water and sewer systems, thus making possible what was before impossible in the way of eliminating the menace presented and the apprehension aroused by the existence of privy vaults, and the statute in question operates merely to remove an objectionable receptacle where an opportunity exists of supplying a means of getting rid of the objectionable matter. It operates to repress privy vaults under reasonable limitations, for the land on which the privy vault to be repressed was situated must abut upon a street in which there was a sewer. Then, if there was no connection with the sewer from that land, ten days after notice given were allowed to make the proper connections and comply with the statute. Then, if the owner or occupant neglected or refused to comply, a penalty of not less than $5 or more than $20 for each subsequent twenty-four hours during which he should neglect or refuse to comply therewith was imposed; and if this accumulating penalty, this milder means, failed of accomplishing the result, then the board of aldermen, as a last resort, could cause the privy vault to be filled up and destroyed. The pressure of power was applied at first very moderately, and free from harshness, gradually increasing until it might well be claimed that the fear of a money penalty would not repress the evil, and only culminating at last in the actual repression by the board when the owner or occupant had neglected or refused to act.

Is notice to the owner or occupant before the passage of the order by the board of aldermen, under the statute in question, constitutionally necessary, or is it requisite that he should have what is called "his day in court," or a trial by jury, before the passage of said order, or before the privy vault can be filled up and destroyed? c. Water-closets and privies.

In the principal case of HARRINGTON v. PROVIDENCE the right of a municipality to declare privy vaults nuisances, and to require them removed without giving an opportunity for the owners to show whether the same are or are not nuisances, was upheld, it being sufficient that the legislature had so treated them in a statute, even though they had not expressly declared them to be such.

In Wahle v. Reinbach, 76 Ill. 322, privies were looked upon as prima facie nuisances, but that case was an action by a private individual to restrain their erection and continuance near his dwelling.

Ordinances enacted relating to privies and the removal of the contents thereof by a person duly licensed, subject to the orders of the board of health in matters relating thereto, and providing for the written application of such person and evidence as to his character and security of his appliances, such license to run for one year with power of renewal on payment of certain fees, and the giving of a bond, are a lawful and proper exercise of the powers given the city by its charter to pass ordinances for the preservation of the health of the city, and to prevent and remove nuisances, and to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases. Boehm v. Baltimore, 61 Md. 259, 263.

Under a city ordinance passed pursuant to the provisions of the charter, enacting that no person shall keep on his or her premises any nuisance to the annoyance of his or her neighbors, and that any person so annoyed may complain to the city council, who shall require the same to be abated within twenty-four hours, and make provisions in cases of refusal to abate the same, a privy attached to a store, twelve years old, and offensive, is a nuisance. Vason v. Augusta, 38 Ga. 542, 548.

So, an ordinance imposing a fine for failing and refusing after due notice to fill up the vaults or sinks or privies on premises within the city, passed under the provisions of a city charter giving the authorities power, inter alia, to abate nuisances, is valid and infringes no constitutional right. Monroe v. Gerspach, 33 La. Ann. 1011.

And the Tennessee act of 1879, condemning all buildings, cisterns, wells, privies, and other erec-tions in the taxing district found to be unhealthy, as nuisances, was upheld in Theilan v. Porter, 14 Lea, 622, 52 Am. Rep. 173.

In St. Louis v. Flynn, 123 Mo. 413, a city ordinance passed under the provisions of the city charter providing for the abatement of nuisances, or the removal of accumulated filth, giving the health commissioner power, whenever in his opinion such nuisances or filth existed, and, after being officially so declared of record by the board of health, providing that notice be given to the owner or agents thereof, to abate and remove the same, and if he failed to do so within the time indicated, which time was discretionary with the health commissioner, such owner was deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to a fine, was upheld. The case, however, turned upon the question of the sufficiency of the notice and of the service thereof.

And an ordinance of the town council relating to the cleaning of sinks, cesspools, etc., is within the provisions of N. J. Stat. April 6, 1871, which confers full power to pass, alter, and repeal ordinances for regulating and suppressing nuisances in the township. State, Nicoulin v. Lowery, 49 N. J. L. 391.

In an action brought to recover a penalty for an alleged violation of a special order of the board of health declaring a certain privy vault to be a nuisance, dangerous to life and health, and requiring the ventilation of the same, the question as to whether the same is a nuisance is covered, so far as the New York law is concerned, by the principles established in the case of Metropolitan Bd. of Health v. Helster, 37 N. Y. 661, which case is to be regarded as settling the law upon the points involved in the decision. New York Health Department v. Knoll, 70 N. Y. 630, 636.

The exercise of the powers contained in N. Y. Stat. 1882, chap. 410, § 537, 1089, relating to the construction of drains in a conscientious manner by the board of health, is for the advantage of the health of the city by protecting the inmates of houses from the ill arising from an imperfect system of drainage, the act being in the nature of a police regulation for the preservation of health, and therefore a person refusing to comply with the orders of a board of health in constructing a private sewer from his premises in the manner pointed out and directed by the board will be restrained at the instance of the board. New York Health Department v. Lalor, 38 Hun, 542.

Although the mayor and aldermen of the city of New York have power to pass by-laws and ordinances in advance to prevent nuisances, as well as to secure their abatement, and although the board of health may have power to act upon a particular matter or thing dangerous to the public health and

v. Albany, 9 Wend. 571, 609, 24 Am. Dec. 165, says: "Much stress was laid by the counsel for the appellants upon the fact that the exercise of the right claimed by the respondents would result in the destruction of their property, without the benefit of a trial by jury, and that, consequently, the ordinance in question was a violation of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights. The same objection would apply to the dejection of every nuisance, yet nothing is clearer or better settled than the right to exercise this power in a summary manner, not only where the whole community is affected, but where a private individual alone is injured. It is a right necessary to the good order of society, and the reason why the law allows this private and summary method of doing one's self justice is because injuries of this kind, which obstruct or annoy such things as are of daily convenience and use, require an immediate remedy, and cannot wait for the slow progress of the ordinary forms of justice."

cause it to be removed, yet they have not power to assume in advance that all the stinks and privies in the city of New York are or will become nuisances, or dangerous to the public health, and contract for the removal of their contents indefinitely until they or the common council otherwise order. Gregory v. New York, 40 N. Y. 273, 283.

In People v. Wood, 63 Hun, 131, the board of health served an order upon the defendant calling upon him to abate and suppress a nuisance and source of danger to life and health upon his premises, arising from a privy which required cleaning. The court in a prosecution for the violation of an ordinance held that the act of the board of health in making such order against the defendant ex parte and without notice to him was without jurisdiction and void, although the court stated that the board of health might, at the expense of the party maintaining it, abate the public nuisance, being accountable to the party injured for an abuse of the power which was to be exercised only in extreme cases.

Under the power of a board of health to declare and abate nuisances it may declare privies to be public nuisances where they tend to endanger the public health, and such boards act strictly in the line of their duty in ordering them to be cleaned and purged, and in charging the owner of the premises with the costs thereof. Philadelphia v. Provident Life & T. Co. 133 Pa. 224, 226.

The discretion vested in the board of health of the city of Philadelphia by Pa. act January 29, 1818 (Pamph. Laws, 38), making it the duty of such board to cause such of the privies to be emptied or corrected as the board shall from time to time deem necessary for the health of the inhabitants, and giving them power to determine whether or not a privy vault, in view of the surroundings, is a nuisance per se, and by Pa. act April 5, 1849 (Pamph. Laws, 346), requiring the board to remove the cause of all nuisances, gives such board power to determine whether or not a particular privy vault in view of the surroundings is a nuisance per se. Adams v. Ford, 3 Pa. Super. Ct. 230.

And under such statutes the board of health of the city may, in the exercise of such discretion, require such a vault to be filled up when it decides that cleaning is not sufficient to abate the nuisance. Adams v. Ford, 3 Pa. Super. Ct. 230.

Yet under the power to declare and abate nuisances, a board of health has no power to order water closets to be constructed by the owners, although the act under which they exercised their powers authorizes them to remove the cause of all nuisances that exist or which may thereafter be

In King v. Davenport, 98 Ill. 805, 88 Am. Rep. 89, the question was as to the validity of an ordinance of the city of Jacksonville, it having been empowered to pass the same, to establish fire limits, and to declare the building or repairing of buildings with combustible materials within the fire limits a nuisance, and to provide against the erection of buildings, roofs, or cornices, with other than fireproof material within said fire limits, and which provided that if the offender, upon reasonable notice, failed to remove such wooden building, or wooden part of such building, the city marshal, upon the written direction of the mayor, should remove or tear down such building or such part thereof as may be necessary. The ordinance further provided that the offender should be subject to a fine of $100 for each week he failed to remove such wooden building, or wooden part thereof, and that, if the city caused the removal the expense of the removal might be recovered of the offender. The plaintiff's tescreated, especially where the cause of the nuisance is not the privy well itself, but its contents. Philadelphia v. Provident Life & T. Co. 133 Pa. 224, 226.

So, the authorities will be justified in removing and abating as a public nuisance a county jail and the cesspool connected therewith situated in a public square when the same are dangerous to health. Llano v. Llano County, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 128.

Under a provision of the city charter giving the health commissioners of a city power to abate as a nuisance any business or practice dangerous or detrimental to the public health, the health commissioners of a city have no authority to construct an indoor water-closet in place of a privy, and require the landowner to pay the costs thereof. Eckhardt v. Buffalo, 19 App. Div. 1.

And a notice served upon the landowner declaring such privy to be a nuisance to health, and directing the water-closets to be put in, is no authority to the health commissioners, without further notice, to construct a water-closet at the owner's expense. Eckhardt v. Buffalo, 19 App. Div. 1.

And the fact that there is great and "imminent" peril to the public health by reason of "impending" pestilence because of the existence of Asiatic cholera in seaports several thousand miles away which have connection with the city will not authorize the health commissioner to construct such water-closet as substitute for the privy at the owner's expense. Eckhardt v. Buffalo, 19 App. Div. 1.

But an order of the justices under the English public health act of 1875, calling upon the owner to abate a nuisance arising from untrapped drains, which did not specify what works and things were to be done in order to abate the nuisance, was held bad in Queen v. Wheatley, L. R. 16 Q. B. Div. 34, the order only calling upon the owner to execute such works and do such things as might be necessary to remove the nuisance.

Under the English metropolis management act, 18 & 19 Vict. chap. 120, the vestry and district board of the parish may, if necessary, convert an insufficient privy into a water-closet after notice to the owner, and recover the costs from the owner. St. Luke v. Lewis, 1 Best & S. 935, 31 L. J. M. C. N. S. 83, 8 Jur. N. S. 432, 5 L. T. N. S. 603, 10 Week. Rep. 120.

And under the English public health act of 1843, 11 & 12 Vict. chap. 63, § 54, the surveyor of the board of health may examine any drain, water-closet, privy, or cesspool or ashpit, and if in bad order or condition the board shall cause notice to be given to the owner to do the necessary work to remedy the same, and if such notice is not complied with they may recover the penalty imposed upon the owner.

tratrix violated this ordinance by taking off an old and out of repair shingle roof from her building, situated within the fire limits, and putting thereon, without permission, a new shingle roof. She failing to remove the same upon due notice, the roof was removed by the city marshal in conformity with the ordinance, whereupon she brought an action of trespass against the mayor and marshal of the city for the removing of the roof, and, dying since the bringing of the action, her executor was substituted as plaintiff. The defendants justified under the ordinance, and the sole question was as to the validity of the ordinance. The court, in its opinion, said, inter alia (p. 814, 18 Am. Rep. 95): "There can be no doubt, it seems to us, that the ordinance in question was a police regulation, proper, and made in good faith, 'for the purpose of guarding against the calamities of fire' in a populous neighborhood, and we must regard it as an entirely reasonable regulation. There is no more frequent or admittedly proper exercise of the police power than that of the prohibition of the erection of buildings of combustible materials in the populous part of a town, and the only means of making such prohibition effectual is by summary abatement. Every moment's delay in the removal of the nuisance is constant exposure to danger. Before any judicial inquiry and hearing could be had in the matter, the whole evil sought to be guarded against might be produced. The imposition of a penalty would but punish the offender, it would not remove the source of danger. This latter is the thing which the necessity of the case requires, and immediate abatement is the only competent remedy."

Salem v. Eastern R. Co. 98 Mass. 481, 96 Am. Dec. 650, was an action to recover money expended from the city treasury by its board of health to remove a nuisance, which removal, being the digging of a canal for the abatement of a nuisance in a mill pond, was made under an ordinance of the city authorized by a statute of the state. Mr. Justice Wells, in delivering the opinion of the court, on page 442 used this language: "The proceedings of the board the board having a discretion in determining what works are necessary, and such discretion is not reviewable by the justices. Hargreaves v. Taylor, 8 Best & S. 613, 23 L. J. M. C. N. S. 111, 9 Jur. N. S. 1053, 8 L. T. N. S. 149, 11 Week. Rep. 562.

In Tinkler v. Wadsworth Dist. Bd. of Works, 2 De G. & J. 261, 27 L. J. Ch. N. S. 842, 4 Jur. N. S. 263, the board of works entered upon the plaintiff's property for the purpose of changing into water-closets certain privies attached to cottages on his land, alleging the same to be nuisances. The court held that under the powers vested in such board by the metropolis local management act of 18 & 19 Vict. chap. 120, the board had exhausted their powers and must therefore be restrained, the order served by them upon the defendant appearing to have been made, not with regard to the state of the particular property in question, but in consequence of a previous determination to substitute water-closets for privies throughout the district.

Although the English local government act of 1858, § 34, as a means of preventing nuisances to health, enables the local board of health to make by-laws with respect to the drainage of buildings to water-closets, privies, ashpits, and cesspools in connection with buildings, yet such section does not empower them to make a by-law to the effect that no dwelling house shall be erected without having at the rear or side thereof a good and sufficient back street or roadway at least 12 feet wide communicating with some adjoining public street or highway for the purpose of affording access to the privy or ashpit of such house. Waite v. Garston Local Bd. of Health, L. R. 3 Q. B. 5, 37 L. J. M. C. N. S. 19, 17 L. T. N. S. 201, 16 Week. Rep. 78.

So, in Ex parte Whitchurch, L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 545, 50 L. J. M. C. N. S. 41, 29 Week. Rep. 507, 45 J. P. 302, the nuisance complained of consisted of a privy and ashpit in such a state as to constitute a nuisance, and notice was given by the local sanitary authority under the English public health act of 1875, § 94, to abate the same by filling up the ashpit, abandoning the privy, and building a pall closet, and upon the failure of the owner so to do an order was made by the justices under § 96, calling upon him to carry out the notice. Upon certiorari it was held that the order of the justices was bad, as they had no authority to order the erection of such a closet under the 96th section of the act.

In Ex parte Saunders, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 191, 52 L. J. M. C. N. S. 89, 31 Week. Rep. 918, 47 J. P. 584, the sanitary authorities gave notice under the same 88 L. R. A.

statute to abate as a nuisance a water-closet in the center of a house and to remove the same near an outer wall, so that there might be proper ventilation, and to fix the soil pipe outside the walls. The court held that the justices, upon the failure of the defendant to carry out the notice, had jurisdiction to compel him to do so under the 96th section of the act, distinguishing the case from that of Ex parte Whitchurch, L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 545, 50 L. J. M. C. N. S. 41, 29 Week. Rep. 507, 45 J. P. 302, upon the ground that in that case the owner of the premises had a privy of the ordinary kind and the order did not direct the execution of such works as might be necessary for preventing it from becoming a nuisance, but directed another kind of closet to be put in its place.

So, in Green v. Lewellyn, L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 681, the sanitary authorities served a similar notice under the provisions of the same statute calling upon the owner to abate a nuisance consisting of a privy openly discharging nightsoil and offensive matter on the bank of a river, to remove the pipes and pan and level the floor, and provide a galvanized pan so as to prevent the nuisance injurious to health. Upon his failure to comply it was held that the justices had jurisdiction to compel him. In that case the court approved of the decision in Ex parte Saunders, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 191, 52 L. J. M. C. N. S. 89, 31 Week. Rep. 918, 47 J. P. 584, but dissented from that in Ex parte Whitchurch, L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 545, 50 L. J. M. C. N. S. 41, 29 Week. Rep. 507, 45 J. P. 302.

Again, in Parker v. Inge, L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 564, after a similar notice had been served upon the defendant as required by the same statute, he was summoned upon complaint by the inspector of nuisances for the borough for maintaining a nuisance in his house and premises in the nature of a defective water-closet and sink drains. The court held him liable, although he claimed that he could not enter upon the premises without the consent of the tenant, to whom the same were let on a long lease.

In St. James and St. John v. Feary, L. R. 24 Q. B. Div. 708, the proceedings of the vestry under the Metropolis management acts of 1865 and 1862, which required houses in the district to be provided with a water-closet or privy and ashpit furnished with proper doors and covers, and making provision for the recovery of penalties imposed in neglecting to comply with its provisions after notice, it was held that if the defendant objected to the proceedings of the vestry his proper course was to apply to the

of health are said to be defective, because taken without previous notice to the defendants and opportunity to be heard. The evidence tended to show that the defendants were notified of the pendency of proceedings, and of the action taken by the board of health from time to time, but there was no such notice beforehand as would give the defendants an opportunity to appear and be heard upon the contemplated action of the board; and there was no hearing upon any of the questions before them. The statute does not require any previous notice. Notice must be given of general regulations prescribed by the board of health under §§ 5 and 6, before parties can be held in fault for a disregard of their requirements. But, although such general regulations may seriously interfere with the enjoyment of private property, and disturb the exercise of valuable private rights, no previous notice to parties so to be affected by them is necessary to their validity. They belong to that class of police regulations to which all individual rights of property are held subject, whether established directly by enactments of the legislative power, or by its authority through boards of local administration." After citing various cases, and enlarging upon the reasons for notice not being required, viz., the necessity for summary action, the fact that delay for hearing the parties might defeat all beneficial results from an attempt to exercise the power conferred upon boards of health, etc., the learned judge concludes on this point as follows (p. 444, 96 Am. Dec. 655): "The necessity of the case, and the importance of the public interests at stake, justify the omission of notice to the individual. When the statute authorizing the proceedings requires no notice, their validity without notice is not to be determined by the apparent propriety of giving notice in the particular case, but by considerations affecting the whole range of cases to which the statute was intended to apply."

In Blair v. Forehand, 100 Mass. 136, 139, 1 Am. Rep. 94, 97 Am. Dec. 82, where the question was as to the validity of a statute authorizing the summary killing of unlicensed county council, and not having done so the matter rested with the magistrate whether the order had been made by the vestry, and whether it had been disobeyed, and if found so to be the conviction under the act was proper.

In Queen v. Osler, 32 U. C. Q. B. 324, the defendant was convicted for maintaining a drain from the privy vault which was obstructive and offensive, and for neglecting and refusing to remove, clean, alter, amend, or repair the same after notice contrary to the by-law of the municipality made in respect thereto for the benefit of the public health.

d. Drains and drainage.

The finding of a board of health that a drain and sewer emptying into a public street of a city is a nuisance, is prima facie evidence of the fact, the board acting in accordance with the provisions of its ordinance by taking proceedings against the owner of the premises after notice given to abate the same. Kirkwood v. Cairns, 44 Mo. App. 89, 93, 95.

In State, Bd. of Health, v. Hutchinson, 30 N. J. Eq. 218 and 559, the court abated a private sewer or drain at the instance of the board of health, the same having become a public nuisance, even though it was laid by the permission of the authorities and the ordinance granting such permission had not been repealed.

In the above case as reported in 30 N. J. Eq. 559, 577, it is said that, if a business such as that of a hotel cannot dispose of its necessarily accumulating filth without creating a nuisance, and happens to be erected in a populous city, and will not or cannot provide sewers or other facilities for disposing of such filth without injury, such business must cease in that locality until it can be conducted with due regard to public safety and comfort, and the court therefore sustained the decree of the court granting an injunction against the creation of a nuisance.

Where it was sought to restrain the discharge of sewage by the defendant city upon the lands of an adjoining town, and notice had been given to such defendant of the determination of the board of health of the town to consider the matter, and also of the subsequent hearing and resolution of such board, to which notices no attention was paid by the city, the subsequent proceedings of the board of health with respect to the abatement of such nuisance were considered valid and within the provisions of the New York Statutes of 1886. Bell v. Rochester, 38 N. Y. S. B. 739, wherein the court restrained the discharge of sewage upon the lands of the town from the city sewers.

Under N. Y. Stat. chap. 824 of the Laws of 1850, as amended by the act of 1883, chap. 351 of the Laws of 1882, for the preservation of the public health, which provides for the organization of such boards, and gives them power to make rules and regulations for the suppression and removal of nuisances, which powers were subsequently enlarged, although, in cases outside of the jurisdiction such boards of health have no power to enter upon the premises and summarily abate the nuisance; yet it may seek redress in courts for the prevention of the violation of such rules and regulations and to prevent or abate such nuisance, even though it may arise in a locality outside of their jurisdiction. Gould v. Rochester, 105 N. Y. 46, Reversing 39 Hun, 79. In this case action was brought by the plaintiff as a board of health to restrain defendants from discharging the contents of a sewer upon and over the lands of the town of such board of health, and to have the same declared a nuisance.

And where by the public laws the board of aldermen of a certain city are empowered to provide for the summary removal of drains, vaults, cess-pools, etc., prejudicial to the public health, and a later state statute authorizes town councils to remove nuisances, such latter act repeals the former, and therefore the city authorities must proceed to abate the nuisance in the manner pointed out by the latter act. State v. McCulla, 16 R. I. 190.

So, statutes giving the boards of health authority to fill in land or raise its grade in order to allow better drainage and to prevent the accumulation of offensive materials, and for the suppression of nuisances occasioned thereby, have been upheld in the following cases: Dingley v. Boston, 100 Mass. 544; Cobb v. Boston, 109 Mass. 438, 112 Mass. 181; Phillips v. Middlesex County Comrs. 122 Mass. 258; Phillips v. Middlesex County, 127 Mass. 262; Cambridge v. Munroe, 128 Mass. 496; Bancroft v. Cambridge, 128 Mass. 498; Read v. Cambridge, 126 Mass. 427; Farnsworth v. Boston, 121 Mass. 173; Cavanagh v. Boston, 130 Mass. 428, 438, 434, 52 Am. Rep. 716; Lawrence v. Webster, 167 Mass. 513; Nickerson v. Boston, 131 Mass. 306.

An order of the board of health undertaking to describe the manner in which a nuisance should be removed, such as by filling in the place where the alleged nuisance exists with gravel, earth, or some other proper material, to the satisfaction of the board, and not allowing the owner of the premises to adopt the alternative of excavating or dredging dogs. Mr. Justice Gray said: "All rights of property are held subject to such reasonable control and regulation of the mode of keeping and use as the legislature, under the police power vested in them by the Constitution of commonwealth, may think necessary for the preventing of injuries to the rights of others and the security of the public health and welfare. In the exercise of this power, the legislature may not only provide that certain kinds of property (either absolutely, or when held in such a manner or under such circumstances as to be injurious, dangerous, or noxious) may be seized and confiscated upon legal process after notice and hearing; but may also, when necessary to insure the public safety, authorize them to be summarily destroyed by the municipal authorities without previous notice to the owner—as in the familiar cases of pulling down buildings to prevent the spreading of a conflagration or the impending fall of the buildings themselves, throwing overboard decaying or infected food, or abating other nuisances dangerous to health;" citing various authorities in support thereof.

the flats or of keeping them covered with water to a sufficient depth, is not within the powers vested in such board of health by Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 26, § 8, for the reason that instead of ordering, in general terms, the owner or occupant at his own expense to remove the nuisance, they undertake to prescribe the manner of so doing. Watuppa Reservoir Co. v. Mackenzie, 132 Mass. 71, 73.

And under Mass. Stat. 1868, chap. 160, such an order is of no effect unless the owner or occupant of the premises has been served with notice and had a hearing. Watuppa Reservoir Co. v. Mackenzie, 132 Mass. 71, 73.

Where a city is authorized by charter to fill in a lot in order to suppress a nuisance on default made by the owner, it is given the power to demand, against such owner, the costs of filling in if done by the city, and the avement of the amount and costs of the work is one upon which an issue may be taken. Hannibal v. Richards, 82 Mo. 380.

"By 18 & 19 Vict. chap. 121, § 12, where a nuisance is ascertained by the local authorities to exist, they shall cause complaint thereof to be made before a justice of the peace; and such justice shall issue a summons requiring the person by whose act, default, permission, or sufferance the nuisance arises or continues, or if such person cannot be found or ascertained, the owner or occupier of the premises on which the nuisance arises, to appear before any two justices, who shall proceed to inquire into the complaint; and if it be proved to their satisfaction that the nuisance exists, the justices shall make an order on such person, owner, or occupier for the abatement or discontinuance and prohibition of the nuisance." By § 8 of the same act "nuisance" includes any ditch or drain so foul as to be a nuisance or injurious to health; any accumulation or deposit which is a nuisance or injurious to health. Brown v. Bussell, L. R. 3 Q. B. 251.

In the above case the defendant drained his premises into a barrel drain, which also received the sewage of other premises, the drain passing for a certain distance under a turnpike road, and thence the sewage was conveyed by an open drain through certain land not owned by the defendant, and ultimately into an open drain about half a mile from defendant's premises by the side of other lands not belonging to him. This drain was a nuisance, the matter from defendant's premises in itself being sufficient to cause one, and on complaint the justices ordered it abated by cutting off all communication from the defendant's premises to

In the celebrated Trinity Church Case, New York Health Department v. Trinity Church, 145 N. Y. 82, 47, 27 L. R. A. 710, Mr. Justice Peckham gave expression to this obiter dictum: "This is not the case of a proceeding against an individual on the ground of the maintenance of a nuisance by him; nor is it the case of an assumed right to destroy an alleged nuisance without any other proof than the decision of the board itself (with or without a hearing) that the thing condemned was a nuisance. Nor is it the case of the destruction of property which is in fact a nuisance, without compensation. Where property of an individual is to be condemned and abated as a nuisance it must be that somewhere between the institution of the proceedings and the final result the owner shall be heard in the courts upon that question, or else that he shall have an opportunity when calling upon those persons who destroyed his property to account for the same, to show that the alleged nuisance was not one in fact. No decision of a board of health, even if made on a hearing, can conclude the owner upon the question of nuisance." Mr.

the barrel drain. It was held that the order was right. Brown v. Bussell, L. R. 3 Q. B. 251.

The case of Francomb v. Freeman, L. R. 3 Q. B. 257, was also decided under the authority of the above statute. In that case the defendant, the owner of houses let to tenants, had constructed a drain from the houses onto land not belonging to him by leave of the owner, by which drain sewage was conveyed into and along a watercourse. The accumulation at the mouth of the drain was a nuisance which was ordered to be abated under the above statute, and it was held that the order was valid.

In proceedings under the above statute the question whether or not the persons against whom the proceedings are taken have a legal right to cause their sewage to flow into the given channel is immaterial. Brown v. Bussell, L. R. 3 Q. B. 251; Francomb v. Freeman, L. R. 3 Q. B. 257.

In the two preceding cases it was said to be questionable, when several persons empty sewage into one place and the aggregate becomes a nuisance the amount contributed to by each not being in itself sufficient to cause a nuisance, whether the proceedings could be taken under § 12 of the above act against any of such persons. Brown v. Bussell, L. R. 3 Q. B. 251; Francomb v. Freeman, L. R. 3 Q. B. 257.

Under the English statutes it is no answer to an information at the relation of the board of health to abate a nuisance arising from sewage, that the board has power itself to remedy the evil by making sewers, for the reason that it is the duty of the board to prevent a nuisance arising in its district instead of putting the ratepayers to the expense of additional works. Atty. Gen. v. Colney Hatch Lunatic Asylum, L. R. 4 Ch. 146, 30 L. J. Ch. N. S. 285, 17 Week. Rep. 240, 19 L. T. N. S. 708.

Where, by the public act for the removal of nuisances, a nuisance is defined, and the method of procedure by the local authorities is pointed out, and by a local act the public authorities themselves are bound to flush, cleanse, and trap the sewers in the town, and the proprietors of chemical works are entitled to discharge refuse by two separate drains into a public sewer, by one of which drains liquids impregnated with muriatic acid are discharged, and by the other liquid impregnated with sulphur is discharged, and upon their combination in the sewer sulphurated hydrogenic gas is produced which escapes in quantities sufficient to be injurious to the public health, and no nu-
